The Transit.

Number One of Volume II of the Transit is received from the printers, and being mailed to the engineering exchanges. It comprises carefully prepared scientific papers on engineering topics, by students of the Engineering class of 91, E. A. Walberg, Arthur J. Cox, M. I. Powers, J. G. Spencer and A. H. Brown. It also contains several handsome plates, among which are the Central Building, the Natural Science Building, and the Engineering Testing Laboratory and Drafting-room.

The Engineering Society.

The Engineering Society held its first meeting for the term, Thursday evening in Prof. Jameson's lecture room, about thirty-five members attending. An interesting program was presented, the members of the scientific section of the Faculty addressing the society upon engineering and kindred topics. Prof. Magowan spoke briefly of the work done by the society. Dr. Andrews gave a witty account of the dinner society in the universities of Germany, Prof. Veblen mentioned the electrical engineering work of the University, and Prof. Weid described an observatory planned by students of the Engineering College, with the electrical engineering work of the University, and Prof. Weid described an observatory planned by students of the Engineering week day sooner, as all the Saturdays are occupied up to that time. This list is subject to change by the committee.

Autumn Field Day.

The following is a list of events that will be contested at the autumn field day, to take place Nov. 14, unless the Faculty allow it to be held on some week day sooner, as all the Saturdays are occupied up to that time. This list is subject to change by the committee.

- 30 yard dash.
- 100 yard dash.
- 200 yard dash.
- Running broad jump.
- Standing broad jump.
- Running high jump.
- Standing high jump.
- Pole vault.
- Hittie kick.
- Putting shot.
- Class relay race.
- Medals will be awarded to winners. Entries can be made up to noon of the day of the contest.

Students in the University desiring to take part in the literary programs of St. Patrick's Young Men's Literary Society will please hand their names to Mr. Cash, Mr. Donahoe, or Mr. Troy. This society holds its meetings on Sunday evenings in St. Patrick's Hall, to which all students are invited. The opening program will be given next Sunday evening, at 7:30.
Tennis at S. U. I.

It is a lamentable fact that tennis in S. U. I. is practically at a standstill. There is not a college of any standing in the state that does not take a deeper interest in tennis than we do. Why is it? While not desiring to throw any blame on individuals, yet it does seem as though the association has not done its duty. Not a meeting has been held this term, and no interest whatever is shown in tennis. It is practically at a standstill. We have no young players coming on, and we have not any young players coming on, and we have not any younger players coming on. Why is not desiring to throw any blame on individuals, yet it does seem as though the association has not done its duty. Not a meeting has been held this term, and no interest whatever is shown. To be sure we have about four brilliant players, and they are at present practically the tennis fraternity of S. U. I. This is wrong. We have no younger players coming on, and in a few years our present players will be gone. Not a court has been marked out on the campus. In Eastern institutions tennis has more participants than any other branch of athletics. Here it is just the opposite. The three dirt courts are capable of accommodating the number of players who use them at present. Next spring we hope to see a great revival in tennis here. The only way to accomplish this result is to set to work immediately. Reorganize, take in new members, and build up a rousing association. There will be a month of good tennis weather yet, and then why not provide a place for play during the long winter months? Let a meeting be called, and those who take any interest in tennis whatever respond.

We would suggest that the students of the Collegiate Department show a little more of that fabled class spirit which is so potent a factor in other colleges, by choosing and keeping certain seats during chapel exercises. There are three sections of seats, and a good division would be for the Seniors and Juniors to occupy the central section; while the Freshmen sit in one of the side sections and the Sophomores in the other. This arrangement would enable new students to immediately locate themselves, would give strangers a better idea of the relative size of classes, and would be more satisfactory to the classes themselves.

Major Head has organized a club for target practice during the winter term of drill. The membership is limited to men of the Senior and Junior classes. Indoor target practice will be the object of weekly meetings of the club. It promises to be an interesting feature as it is novel.

It had rained all night. The sun rose over a still bleak horizon throwing grey mists over all the landscape. The trees shook tiny drops from their leaves and a chill breeze soon blew the mists away; the sky grew brighter, but a soft grey settled over the heavens deepening toward the horizon. Students hastened to their morning recitations, their faces blue with cold; the women shivered over the radiators before going to classes; the men with overcoats buttoned and their hands in their pockets walked energetically up the central walk, not lingering for a morning salute to fellow students. In the recitation rooms the windows had been raised, one by one they were closed as the trees outside nodded their heads in and forbidding that winter was soon at hand. The morning quickly passed away; these chill October mornings are profitable as well as dreary; they fill us with new zeal and seize us, but this too, passes with the day. The air grows warmer toward noon and a few persons are seen upon their bicycles.

This evidently is not a day for listless strolls; not a day for bashful locks in the pockets and a bright fireside, stealing sweetly over his spirit and be Forgot his cares and troubles in the warm within. The evening gloam earlies settles over all. Within doors we sit by a bright fireside, while quickly the minutes fly as we in reverie watch the embers die away.

I am sitting in the library. Everything is still except now and then a book is closed with a rap or some one walks on tip toe across the floor from their pieces above, the busts of Shakespeare and Goethe look down upon me.

On the right several industrious students are gathered about one end of the long table. Just in front is a young lady and a gentleman talking to gether, but a half suppressed laugh now and then tells that the subject of their conversation is not less. Now a senior stands in with a big book under his arm, enters the book room, and again all is still. A noise is heard in the hall; the two humorous ones cease talking and everyone looks up. Now the door opens and in comes several vi sitors to see the library. They look around uneasily at the students and pass on into the book room, from which the murmur of their voices comes to us as they walk about among the books. The University clock now strikes. Some of the students go to their classes and others come in and take their places. I am reminded that I have a recitation at this hour and take up my books and leave.

I am sitting in my window looking out upon the street. The day has been a very disagreeable one, as the rain has fallen incessantly since morning. It is expected to last all day, as the people who are unfortunate enough to be compelled to be out of doors, are going home from their work down town. Some women daintily hold up their skirts while others drag along as if they were disgusted with the world. A man and a woman are now going by. He is carrying an umbrella and she is endeavoring to keep under it, but only succeeds in sheltering her head, while her shoulders catch the water as it drips from above. At last they turn in at a house. He goes ahead with the umbrella and she follows in the rain.

A student sat brooding late at night over a lesson which taxed his utmost strength. For hours he had wrestled with his subject, but no ray of light was vouchsafed him. All was enveloped in inscrutable darkness. His head ached and his brow was feverish on account of the prolonged struggle. How humiliating to think that after all his labor he should again be obliged to leave his task unaccomplished. The thought was too much for him. Piously seizing his hat he rushed out into the midnight air. How calm and serene shone the stars above him! How softly smiled upon him the moon with her gentle beams! The beauty of the scene overwhelmed him. Never had he had the thought of creation's glory and immensity so strongly been forced upon him. The calm of the hour came stealing sweetly over his spirit and he forgot his cares and troubles in the thought of earth's loneliness.

Three New Books.

Dr. Holmes' publishers have brought out in a handsome leather binding a new edition of the immortal "One Horse Shay." This humorous and clever story of the deacon's masterpiece—the shay that was "Built in such a logical way that it ran a hundred years to a day," and then collapsed—has been for many years one of the most popular short pieces in American verse.

The two accompanying poems are conceptions which, though less logical, are none the less truly artistic; and the three together, illustrated by one who seems to have caught with nicety the spirit of his subjects make a delightful volume.

The great Unitarian preacher and author whose biography is before us, was born in 1819 and died in 1888.

entered Harvard at the age of fifteen, the average years of that famous class of '29. Benjamin Pierce, mathematician, Benj. R. Curtis, jurist, Oliver Wendell Holmes, author, were the classmates of Dr. Clarke.

The chapter on Cambridge is full of thoughts interesting to a college man. The words on the value of a college course are so apt, and serve so well to rebuke the fun often poked at college men, that we quote them: "Each class was a little world, a microcosm. Here were collected all the chief varieties of human character; here were displayed the human passions, the little vanities and weaknesses, fine and coarse impulses, noble and mean motives, with which we were to come in contact in the world.

It was not a bad preparation for life, and I have observed that the chances of success in the world are much in favor of one who has been through college. He gets a certain mental discipline, a power of self-control which is very helpful. This comes in part from the habit of systematic study, but still more, as I judge, from this boiling cauldron of juvenile struggles, sympathies, antipathies, successes and disappointments. Thus I think it a good thing to go through college, even though one should accomplish very little in the student's curriculum.

Autobiographies are always interesting, and this one of Dr. Clarke will have a wide circulation among Christians of all denominations, to whom his memory is very dear.

The Biglow Papers, by James Russell Lowell. 12 mo., 81/2 Hopkinton, Mifflin & Co.

The satire on contemporaneous history, on literature and life, on the little accidents of surviving the time and affairs that call it forth. The Biglow Papers were written to voice the popular feeling of New England and the larger portion of the north in respect (in the case of the First Series) to the Mexican War, which Lowell looked upon as a national crime, and (in the case of the Second Series) to various phases of the Civil War. But notwithstanding they related primarily only to current history and were couched in the rude Yankee dialect, nevertheless a certain generalization was infused through them all, which made their logic and common sense universally apt.

While Lowell's literary reputation stands rather upon his later works, yet it was the Biglow Papers that first gained him a national fame; and the demand for the present handy volume testifies to their lasting qualities.

About seven years ago I had Bronchitis, which finally drifted into Consumption, so the doctors said, and they had about given me up, I was confined to my bed. One day my husband went for the doctor, but he was not in his office. The doctor sent me a bottle of Piso's Cure for Consumption. I took two doses, and it greatly relieved me before the doctor came. He told me to continue. Its use as long as it helped me, and the result is, I am now sound well and entirely cured of Consumption, Mr. P. E. Baker, Harrisburg, Ill., Feb. 26, 1895.
