In considering the conquest of fire we have no facts of observation, and are forced to the use of the hypothesis. The hypothesis of V. P. Hamilton is the most probable. Things that exhibited smell were considered animals. From this Cashung made the hypothesis that fire was at one time considered an animal, treated as such, but upon dry fuel, and punished with its greatest enemy, water.

The first work on metal was that of cold hammering. Meteoric iron was largely used. It is sometimes found beaten into thin sheets. This kind of iron cannot be forged. Heat was employed to a small extent by our American Indian, but he did not understand alloying.

The early American indians were hunters of the chase, especially upon the sea. From this we conclude that the home of the primitive man was along the shore. The beliefs in the cults of the sea were very marked in the Indian, as proved by their many ceremonies. In the great development of agriculture it has become impossible to tell what was the original form of many of our plants, because they have been artificultivated in all great nations.
