JANE ADDAMS

CHERUBILISTICAL RELATIONSHIP

Thursday afternoon a large audience crowded the little Union church to hear the second lecture of a series on "Democracy and Social Ethics" by Jane Addams of Hull House, Chicago.

The best book written in America on charitable work, said Miss Addams, is by Anna George Warner, who says that there are but three methods of taking up and accomplishing charitable work.

The first method is to reconstruct the plan of consumption and production, according to the general principle of production in order to provide, in poverty, and third, to do more individual work among the poor.

Some believe that charity is the fault of one who possesses it, and because they are poor it is assumed that they are an indolent and vicious class. Sometimes this is true, yet it is not universally so, and that at the present time men judge, more by social standards than the ability to make money. The democratic process wants the idea of judging the poor exclusively by the industrial test.

We are really throwing aside the charities which are beneficial, in too many cases to the poor, and then counter its work, and give their recipient are engaging in a common struggle for the larger life.

In asking Miss Addams asked that the following lecture be a continuation of Democracy and Social Ethics under the title "The Social".

EDUCATIONAL METHODS

The crowd of citizens and students which met at Unity church Friday afternoon to hear Jane Addams, was, to the writer, much pleased with the theorem set forth.

The lecture was very interesting for the fact that it was given and was made made entertaining by the many illustrations of the treatment by the industrial quarters of Chicago, and of the children who leave school early in order to enter into work.

In beginning the talk Miss Addams said, "We assume that Democracy is the ultimate vision toward which society is tending".

"But--are we ever going to get rid of the idea of every child learning to read and write, in order now to be in order to endure forms of life and help the child along the line of his own experience and ability to reach his own possibilities, and enable him to direct his own activities and adjust them with those of other people?"

Finally, Miss Addams says "Education is mainly and sometimes the character of the individual. School is made to be heavy for the average child. It must be modified to suit the child.

In this is the best lecture yet given under the head of "Democracy and Social Ethics."
