BAIL TO THE CLIONIANS

The Clionians, the female students' social club at the University of Iowa, have entertained their students in the new building. The society at the Close, and the women of the other two ladies' societies, will hold a joint meeting in the new building with the purpose of forming a new society of university authorities, all to meet in the University of Iowa. The Clionians will also meet in the new building on Monday evening to make a joint announcement on the coming morning after noon.

The society has at present picked up considerable interest, and it is expected to grow even larger. The social character of the society is not in question, but it will be seen that the society members are interested in the social life of the university.

The existence of any Greek lot or other societies in Haverford College, Pennsylvania, has been forbidden by the faculty of the institution. In support of its action, the faculty states that while several societies may be of interest in some of the larger universities, where social unity is a practical impossibility, yet it is most institutions, and in the small colleges most of all, they are a positive harm in that they interfere with college duty, draw abnormal social interest and enter into athletics and other enter­prises, and directly lead from the college itself to the fraternity.
