Famous Yale Man, Dr. Chittenden, to Lecture

is a Professor in Yale as well as Head of the Sheffield Scientific School.

The annual lecture of the Sigma Xi society, will be given on the general subject of To-morrow at 8 o'clock evening in the Union Room. The lecture will be by cards of invitation.

Dr. Chittenden is one of the most distinguished of American medical men. He is the professor in the Botany Department at Yale University, and he also stands at the head of that whole group of correlated sciences which Yale calls her "Sheffield Scientific School," the work of which is known all over the world. His researches in the chemical composition of animals and plants have made him one of the boldest biologists, and his publications have been the most valuable and the most important.

During the last six years Dr. Chittenden has been interested in the problem of human nutrition. No subject could be of greater interest now, in the opinion of physiologists, than the study of this food eaten. Yet people are very slow to take the proper frame of mind as to what is good eating and what is bad. Each of us eagerly relies on the advice of his physicians and the pocket vegetable tables without knowing the details. Dr. Chittenden raised the question whether our dietary habits and the way of life that we lead have conducted experiment in the most extensive character, and whether the proper way of life—professional men, university athletes in active training, even men detailed from the U. SAMUEL CALVIN

Professor Samuel Calvin was born February 2, 1840, in the parish of Machrum, Wigtonshire, Scotland. He entered school under a typical Scotch schoolmaster before he was four years old and attended continuously, with the exception of the close harvest season, until 1851, when he migrated with his parents to America. To the Scotch schools he is indebted for efficient memory training. In America the family lived four years in Starling county, New York, and in 1855 removed to Iowa. He entered Ames College at Hopkinton in January, 1863, enlisted with the other men from the college in the spring of 1864, the company being assigned to the 49th Iowa Infantry. After the close of the war, he re-entered college and continued the work of student and instructor until 1866. From September, 1866, to the end of December, 1875, he was Professor in the University of Iowa since January, 1875, was editor, and associate editor of the American Geologist from January, 1886, till December, 1896, when the magazine was merged with a new journal of Geology. He was elected State Geologist of Iowa in 1899, and re-elected in 1903, was re-elected in 1906; fifteen volumes of the Iowa Geological reports have been issued under his directorship, and manuscripts for additional volumes in hand, ready for the press.

He was Secretary of Section E, American Association for the Advancement of Science, in 1900; vice-president of the American Association, and chairman of Section E, in 1904; has served as member of the Council and as vice-president of the Geological Society of America; elected president of the Geological Society for 1906; president of the International Geological Congress whilst not in attendance at Washington in 1891, and in the city of Montreal in 1906. Among the many reports and magazine articles on Geology and related subjects, the Menominee National Advisory planted in Pools and Structural Materials, a Board appointed by the President to co-operate with the Technological Division of the U. S. Geological Survey in making studies in soils and agricultural materials.
