GARY W. WINTER

The Iowa team is also equipped with plays built for the line-smashing, pounding game; but the light Harvard backs are not suited for this play. Their shiftiness and fleetness of foot are their chief assets, and these probably will be utilized to the utmost. The Aggies think they know the secret of the famous Iowa spread play, because they stopped it when it was tried at Grinnell and Cornell; but there are ways and ways of operating the spread, and there are many options on the time schedule which reasonable the upend.

Viewed from this angle, the Aggie right end is stronger in his position than the Iowa offense is superior at the defense. This may be figured either way; you may say that it is a straight matter of position; you may say that the Iowa defense, though good, is not strong enough, and that the right end can, and will, be able to gain the upper hand against the weak Iowa left.

The game is a yes-or-no proposition. The Iowa coaches are not going out on anything, and the Aggies attack the situation.

Forty days the men of the university are to be favored by a series of religious meetings, probably the greatest ever held in this city.

The state university of Iowa, when considering the Iowa schedule for this year, compares our schedule with that of the Ames schedule, and will give us the reason for the foregoing statement.

Our team has been through a hard struggle this fall and need the loyal support and encouragement of every student in the university. They leave today at our call. For Ames.
