The Norland, upon whose decks travelers are leaving, has been sold by the Jews to the British admirals.

Norland is a Dutch merchantman. Under the principle "Free ships make free goods," which has been recognized prior to the war, her passage is not open to suspicion. For the Norland is a neutral vessel proceeding under a neutral flag and, therefore, is entitled to the protection of the British admirals.

Preme to action to and show the interest of the present is the fact that Secretary Bryan today sent a cablegram to Ambassador Page directing him to secure all the facts from the British government and report thereof to the state department without delay. In itself this message will be resented by the British officials as indicative of the concern of the American government over the safety of American flags and American passengers.

Mr. Page is expected to report definitely whether the British officials entered British waters or whether she was forced to Downs, it is the interest of the safety of the ship and its passengers. The government expects permission to proceed again.
