"Palaces of Italy and France" were described by Professor Weller yesterday morning in an ability that brought his lecture in-room 186, liberal and building.

He dealt with the old palaces of Florence, Rome, Venice, London, and Paris. The description was made vivid by use of slides which showed the external and interior construction of various types.

The early palaces were stately homes for kings and very wealthy people but later, as times became more powerful, bars were taken from windows, as were the other evidences of fortifications.

In Venice the palaces were owned by the wealthy people of the country. They were huge masses built of stone, roughly hewn, and were at three stories high. The early days of Venice were troubelous and the palaces were used to serve an enormous function.

One of the earliest palaces in Florence was that of Belazzo Vecchii built in 1298. It was three stories high and in the water was a great court.

In Rome, one of the early structures was created in 1100. Much of the material was secured from the old Coliseum. Rome saw the
