PIONEERS PREFERRED TO LIVE IN FORESTS

The belief that forest lands are more fertile than prairies held by scientists is thoroughly dispelled, says Prof. Se- denton Hinkley, botanist at the University of Michigan. They were not overlooked in the first half and when the whistle blew at the end of this period the crowd of grandstands roared for a victory of 9 to 1. All three of the players made fine displays of body work, the big ball of farm crops. The pioneers look to the woods for treasures for several reasons, the University bulletin points out. The forest offered building material and fuel necessary to the home building; and in its springs were abundant the fertilizers and indispensable water supply; it provided shelter from the biting winds of the open plains and the wind born by the fire food that periodical, which made the forests seem so much like the stove. The pioneer had brought with him the belief that the soils of the forests were better and that his practice of farming did not grow on the prairie.

The practice of the pioneers knew in Iowa have become a necessity for the farmers. Their summer splendor and winterbarrenness have also disappeared. Improved methods of transportation and the woods are sources of artificial fuel and the lumbering is an important industry, but the building of a home and the management of a forest are the foundation of the farming industry. The Iowa man is a product of the forests.

IOWA WOMAN PICKED FOR RED CROSS JOB

B. U. I. Extension Division Worker of Earlham, Iowa Was Home Service Worker.

Miss Ada A. McComb, is charge of the bureau of social wel- fare in connection with the University's extension division, has been granted a leave of absence for six months to take a position with the American Red Cross. She has been made division supervisor of home service for the state of Iowa and will work with the bureau of civilian re- lief of the central division, the headquar- ters of which is in Chicago.

The extension division of the Uni- versity is now conducting a series of four chapter courses in home service for training of volunteers, in which Miss McComb has been asked an active part. This work comes largely of the training of local chap- ter leaders at the special session at some central point in the several districts which have been set for.

The aim of home service, Miss McComb explains, is to short.

The idea of home service is the same as that of charity. It is the idea of helping the people of the community, and its purpose is the care of the homes of enlisted men, to help them maintain normal standards of home life, to advise them about the many problems connected with the result of the absence of husband, father, and son. Miss McComb will be at the service of all Red Cross chapters in the state for consultation and advice in matters bearing on their home service activities. For information, address the University.
