"The day is past when our institutions of learning can remain isolated from the social and industrial life about them. As industry develops more and more and demands scientific research in its various branches, it is but natural that it should turn to the institution which makes, among other things, scientific inquiry its business in life. It is undoubtedly true that the manufacturer of this state will be greatly helped by this work which can best done in university laboratories and by men who are trained for the work. But though the satisfaction given to the manufacturer of the people of the entire state will be benefited."

"And herein, of course, lies the chief function of the state university—that is, addresses itself to the common good of all the people of the state. Such a research bureau will serve to bring home to the citizens what the Fourth of July is to the French, the terrible Bastille, symbol as well as instrument of the grinding oppression which had been done for centuries on the people of France like the frowning of the gloomy prison itself. France and America, from their common struggle for independence untill the time when they fought side by side in the war, have been sister nations. The sympathy between them has been particularly keen, and the bond has been strengthened since the time of Lafayette and the Statue of Liberty till now when America is presenting a return gift of a Marne Monument to France."

The United States would do well to keep alive in the minds of her people the strong spirit of friendliness which prevails between the two countries and some slight observance of Bastille Day could do much to bring this about.
