The death of Pope Benedict XV marks the passing of a leader who has been completely active during the past seven years. He was appointed to the see on December 5, 1914, in a time in which the powers of Europe were being called to try and forestall the catastrophe which was then at hand. The Pope's grief was the greatest of any war.

The conditions of office call for something more than ordinary resignation of that part of the head of an institution, the members of which would be against themselves. On either side, theelligance constantly at work to the Pope to change their cause; and the World, a power, he never once stopped to consider, either side.

Although his reign was cut short by the war, Benedict was a great Pope. In the early days of his pontificate, he was the champion of the Church against the war. In the later years of his pontificate, he was the champion of the world against the war. In the middle years of his pontificate, he was the champion of the Church against the war. In the later years of his pontificate, he was the champion of the world against the war.

The Pope has taken a more active part in the world affairs than any other pope for several centuries, with the exception of Pope Leo XIII, and his interest of his life was not stimulated by his love for a man, but for the world.

In the Pope's efforts to bring about a sense of service in the four years of his pontificate, he has won the respect of the people throughout the world. The Pope is an active part of the world affairs.

BASKETBALL AGAIN
It is easy to fault with a man faults and results of those on the games on the basketball schedule which have produced many knotty problems to solve.

Last year for the first time in history an Iowa basketball team was more than half its games, and was more than half its games, the Big Ten race. That showing was made after the first game was played, and on the schedule. In the first six games of the Big Ten race, it was a team of Iowa.
