Freshmen, Quarter-Holds Firm Bring To Low Scores; Purple Five Strong

If the Iowa basketball team have as much trouble going, through Northwester’s five-man defense as they found when trying to break through Coach Alston’s front in four out of their four games played, the Purple five has lost only two of the team highest in the conference table. Northwestern, as far undefended, did not have any time holding the big end of the team when it played them. Michigan, last Monday night, only was by a sharpened lead, the final score being 71 to 50. McGonigle, their guard, was out of the game then but he will be in the league’s encounter. The Old Gold team has played through basketball as far as could be predicted, noted all her weaknesses in the lead. We shall have to play severe in the first eighteen minutes or we shall expect the dope and give our opp­onents championship hopes a jolt from which the team may not be able to recover. Tullius has lost all his games and will not be very dangerous when the players the Northwestern less love fallen here.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25—Feeling is now too keen between senators tremendous and secretary of state Hughes since the days of the league offers a chance when they took opposite sides.

Relievers Not Cultivated

After Hughes took office Senator Johnson foresaw that his appointment would be a step toward the United Nations in the league through the first thirty years. The fresh face on the scene was a shock to Hughes and to the state department as well as by degree. Hughes, who was given carte blanche by the president, has advocated the policy of foreign affairs handsomely without taking the senators into his confidence except when information was sought by Senate majority. Naturally, this has not yielded the senators whose taste for blood was aroused when they felt the United States out of the treaty of Versailles and the league of nations. Differences between Hughes and the senators centered around the role of the United States in the proposed organization, that in the rea­son for the interest that the Republican resolution stirred up. Hughes had for personal reasons congress to submit to him an American representation to the organization. But congress has refused.

The more the Republican senators be­gan to suspect after meeting the

BEAU BRUMMEL STUDIES OF THE GREAT PERIODS

One of the most discussed

issues en route to Washington, D.C., was the question of whether the United States should enter the League of Nations. Hughes, who was appointed by President Harding, was given the task of negotiating America’s entry into the league. The senators, however, were opposed to Hughes’ approach, fearing that the United States would lose its independence with full American representation in the league. This tension between the senators and the President prompted Hughes to seek a compromise, which eventually led to the formation of the Hughes Resolution, a proposal that sought to balance the interests of both the United States and the senators. The resolution was defeated, and the United States did not join the League of Nations, leaving a lasting impact on American foreign policy.
CONTEMPORARY OPINION

The French Government thus far has not mixed much real in the war, but it has succeeded in keeping a number of us busy. At least, the time being, M. Poincaré has done what as a statesman, is the best thing any Frenchman can do. He has united the Socialists and the reactionaries. The workers and the employers, the agrarians and the industrialists, and he has made a German howling and a Czar howling. We have all

Poincaré's apologists like to say that in using force he is at least speaking a language which the Germans understand. That is what the French President thought in 1914 when they went to war with the French Revolution. That is what another set of Allied Powers thought in 1838 when they went to war with the Russian Revolution. That is what Germany thought when she declared Austrian independed in Belgium and Northern France. That is what the British thought in 1914 when they sent the Black and Blue into Ireland. In that what Germany,

It is one of the oldest blunders of Governments, the most mistaken illusion of statesmen. It arises out of their inability to see that nothing is so calculated to unite a people as oppression by force. For in the presence of this, the
