The only thing that can be said of our second basemen factory is to ask the man who wears the jersey. The only thing to be said about our pitchers is to ask the man who use them.

CONTINUOUS OPINION

LLOYD GEORGE AND THE LAND

Mr. Lloyd George, now a thorough outsider makes a speech recently which demonstrates clearly enough his treatment at his present insignificance in the House of Commons and expresses his desire to get a little closer to the electorate. He is not now even the leader of the opposition, and evidently it occurs to him that since he is a Labor man, one of his own, he can go back in being as Radical as possible. So, in his old 1866 fashion, he utters in his speech the "land monopolists," the territorial arrogants, and demands the land for the people. Possibly the La-er element, buttering his appeal, will remember that this was precisely in his line of talk when he was in opposition many years ago and will ask him why he did not do something to give the people the land in the long period when he was in office.

Mr. Lloyd George is a politician, and always aims to be something first of all of petty advantage, but he is nevertheless right in assuming that the ownership of the land in Britain will have to be revaluated before the country can be really prosperous. The present system has failed to keep the land as the best use for the sake of England is a country of fertile soil, with limited lands, and it should produce a far higher proportion of the food of the nation, besides knowing a much larger number of the people profitably engaged in a healthy occupation. Under present conditions the land is really fit to enable the people who are passing to be able to go back to the people that are not. Something will have to be done about it. Mr. Lloyd George plainly thinks that he is the man to do it. Perhaps he is, but that remains to be seen.
