ADMINISTRATION CHECKS DOLE PLAN

Defense Introduces Testimony To Further Link Isidor Fisch With Kidnaping; State Case Hit

Fingerprint Expert Says Prints Should Last Six Months... Dr. Erastus M. Hudson, New York criminologist, says maker's fingerprints should have shown on kidnap ladder for six months.

Point to Fisch

They again pointed to Hauptmann's friend, Fisch, and just before adjournment an attack on the state's case was made by a New York criminologist who testified the fingerprints of the ladder's maker should have shown for six months, unless he wore gloves.

Blow to State Case

The expert quality of the physician's testimony was regarded as the most effective blow to the state's case against Hauptmann as the builder of the ladder, the kidnaper and the collector of the $50,000 ransom.

Only One Nail Hole

Dr. Hudson testified that when he examined the ladder in March, 1932, he noticed only one, and not the four nail holes which now appear on the upright.

DEFENSE Seeks To Further Involve Fisch

which had stood in a recess of the windowsill of the Lindbergh nursery at the time of the kidnaping was apparently not disturbed by the person who, the state says, went in and out of the window.

Four witnesses had been introduced by the defense in an effort to show Fisch was affluant after the ransom money was paid April 2, 1932 and that he tried to "unload" his money.

Says Hauptmann Gentleman

Mrs. Gerta Henkel, the blond, gum-chewing friend of the Hauptmann family, was recalled to the stand to testify that Hauptmann's conduct toward her was other than circumspect, although he had coffee at her home when Mrs. Hauptmann was in Europe.

He bought her, she said, a "slip" for a Christmas present but both Mr. and Mrs. Hauptmann brought it to her.

Three members of the New Jersey state police force and Dr. E. M. Hudson, a New York criminologist, were recalled to testify to examinations of the ladder for fingerprints.

Ask About Lumber

The three police officers were Lieut. Paul Sjostrom, investigator; and Sergeant Louis Kubler and Trooper Frank A. Kelly, in the bureau of criminal identification.

To Kelly also the defense addressed queries about the lumber in the ladder, the upright of which he state says came from the attic of Hauptmann's home.

Gustave Miller, an outspoken Bronx plumber, also took the stand to testify he had been called to examine a leaking pipe in the Hauptmann home and that in his examination of the attic he did not notice any floor boards missing.

Kelly Balked

It was Hauptmann's story that Fisch left nearly $15,000 in ransom cash with him in a shoe box; that water leaking into a closet caused the shoe box to disintegrate; and that only then did he know Fisch had left behind him a considerable amount of money.

Edward J. Kelly, chief of the defense counsel, was balked in producing the testimony of Oscar John Bruchmann, a Bronx taxicab driver who had known Fisch, that the dead Bronx Jewish furrier had ridden in his cab, displayed a roll of bills, and had given him a $5 gold note for the ride.

Justice Thomas W. Trenchard ruled that unless Bruchmann knew Fisch's money was ransom cash his testimony was inadmissible.

Shows Bills

Another witness, Theron J. Main, who operates an automobile accessory business in Warsaw, N. Y., asserted a man he thought was Fisch, tendered a $20 gold note in a New York restaurant in 1933, and then showed him more bills.

On cross-examination, Main admitted he thought gold notes were yellow-backs and did not know that none of the ransom cash was in gold-backs.

Sam Streppone, a Bronx radio repairman who said he had been in institutions for mental disorders "about five times" testified Fisch had left a box with him for about six hours. It was, he said, about the size of a shoe box.

Testimony Interrupted

Trooper Kelly's testimony regarding the upright in the ladder, which the state says came from Hauptmann's attic, was interrupted frequently by state objections that the questions of Defense Attorney C. Lloyd Fisher were repetitious.

Justice Trenchard told Fisher "You create confusion by these irrelevant remarks of yours."

Kelly said he did not recall ever having discussed the upright with Dr. Hudson.

When Fisher demanded if Kelly had not pointed out to Dr. Hudson there was only one nail hole in the side of the ladder, Kelly replied "that is absolutely not the fact."

Stein Discussed

ard Hauptmann?" Fisher asked him. His answer was "No." Sjostrom said the state police used the Hudson process to find fingerprints on the ladder after it had been handled by several hundred persons, including the crime experts, from all over the country who were invited by then Governor A. Harry Moore to join his crime commission.

Kelly testified he had been unable to find readable prints in the Lindbergh nursery by using a "black powder" method.

Explains Process

Dr. Hudson, a tall, black-haired, solemn-faced man, said he had first used silver nitrate to get fingerprints in 1919 or 1920 and had later learned the method had been used 14 or 20 years earlier in France.

He explained his process, and how he had gone to Hopewell after the state police invited him.

He demonstrated his method to the police, and set troopers to work on the ladder, he said.

Q. And how many prints were developed, Doctor, altogether? A. Well, that would be difficult to say. There were a great many prints. At one time I think I estimated that there were probably at least 500 finger prints and finger print fragments on that ladder.

Prints and Fragments

Q. There were some five hundred perfect? A. Finger prints and fragments of finger prints. Wherever you touch a chair, you will get little fragments, little lines of the ridges that are on your finger; and some can be identified when there are only two or three lines, if they contain pores, which is a means of identification, and other prints, you have to have a good deal of detail to identify the prints.

Q. Well, how many of these fingerprints that were brought out on the ladder were fingerprints such as would be considered of value? A. Well, I would consider more than 50 of value. I mean I would consider every line, even though there were just two or three lines, it would be possible from the character of that process, because it does show pores, to identify even a very small skin fragment.
