As The War Spreads

Although the longer movements in Europe are usually undeveloped, there is a growing realization that the supposed 'cold war' is warming up. The recent leaks about the extent of German and Soviet bayonets have been confirmed by the British actions in this area.

The return of Europe's fighting men to the continent of their own countries will bring a new wave of nationalism and militarism. This is a development that should be recognized, and not be looked upon as a mere repetition of the old story.

The news from the front will certainly develop and, in time, will lead to more widespread wars. We must be prepared for this eventuality, and it is not too late to take steps to prevent it.

The future of Europe's military establishments is a matter of vital importance. We must be sure that the military leaders are given the support they need, and that the work of the people is not hindered by the presence of an army.

The time is ripe for a new approach to the problem of international peace. The League of Nations has shown itself to be inadequate in this respect, and it is time that we looked for a new solution.

The old system of alliances and blockades is one that has failed repeatedly in the past. We must not repeat the mistakes of the past, but must work towards a new system that will be based on the principles of justice and freedom.
