Nazi Send V-Bombs Against Britain in Daylight Raid

LONDON (AP) — German bombers struck London in daylight yesterday for the first time in history, and a strong retort by British fighters was reported by the British government.

It was a daylight attack on London, the first since the raid on September 8, and the British cabinet was summoned to meet at once.

Although the Ministry of Air declined to give the exact number of planes that took part in the raid, it was reported that a strong force of bombers, including the V-1 flying bomb, was used.

The V-1, or "flying bomb," was first seen in March and is reported to have a range of 200 miles. It is said to be a type of rocket that is launched from a large aircraft and has a range of 200 miles.

The German government declared formally on Monday that it had enough momentum to cross the English Channel. The raid was said to be an attempt to force Britain to the negotiating table.
