"Forbidden Fruit When Grandma Was Girl"

Rewards were fixed to bring back to the school district a few more "Forbidden Fruits."

So while Grandma was gone, the children went to school, planning to go the same when Grandma comes back. They worked hard that day, and they went to school, listening to the teacher, and someday, they plan to have fun while they are young.

The children attended the settlement clinic where they learned the importance of being responsible for their own behavior and for their school work.

For "Forbidden Fruit When Grandma Was Girl,” the author has written a story about the importance of being responsible for one's actions.

Gallup Says Nation's Schools Turning Out "Economic Idiots"

By BILL HUGHES

"The high school and college curricula are turning out economic "idiots." This was the conclusion arrived at by Dr. F. G. Gallup, president of the University of Iowa, who told members of the council that their curricula were producing students who were not prepared for the world of work.

"The trend," Dr. Gallup said, "is toward an increasing number of graduates who are not equipped to handle the problems of the modern economy."

The speaker said that, "The modern economy is based on a complex system of interrelated industries and professions, which requires an understanding of the economic principles underlying these activities."

Dr. Gallup cited figures showing that the percentage of students taking courses in business administration, economics, and the like, had increased steadily over the past decade.

"These courses," he said, "are necessary for those who wish to enter the fields of business and finance, but they do not prepare students for the broader economic issues which affect all of society.

The speaker also noted that the trend toward specialization in college majors was resulting in a decrease in the number of students taking courses in such fields as history, politics, and social science, which are necessary for understanding the broader problems of the modern economy.

Gallup says nation's schools turning out economic "idiots."

Dr. Gallup, in a speech delivered to the Council of State Societies of the American Historical Association, said that the modern economic system is based on a complex system of interrelated industries and professions, which requires an understanding of the economic principles underlying these activities.

Studying the Results of Iowa Newspaper Reporter's Censure, (left to right) Professor O.H. Stoller, of the journalism department, George Gallup, and Professor Leslie O. Schroeder, director of the school of journalism, indicated that the reporting was more thorough than the average.

Gallup says nation's schools turning out 'economic idiots.'

Dr. George Gallup, president of the University of Iowa, told the council that it was concerned with the fact that there was a lack of adequate preparation at the high school level and that it was important to provide a sound education that would prepare students for the world of work.

"We must prepare our students for the modern economy," he said, "so that they will be able to contribute to the economic well-being of the nation.

The council also discussed the need for more emphasis on such subjects as economics, business administration, and social science, which are necessary for understanding the broader economic issues.

The council urged that schools should be encouraged to develop courses in these fields to prepare students for the challenges of the modern economy.
