Report 100 Killed In Venezuela

NEW YORK (AP) — Forty-two people were killed and hundreds wounded in a day of rioting that started with a general strike Tuesday and turned into a protest against the government.

The violence erupted when people took to the streets in various towns and cities across the country, demanding the resignation of President Hugo Chavez and the end of his government.

According to a report by glove.com, at least 42 people were killed and more than 500 were injured in the violence.

Chavez, who has been in power since 1999, has faced widespread criticism and opposition from the opposition and the international community.

The government has said the violence was caused by a small group of violent individuals and has accused the opposition of using it to destabilize the country.

The government has also said it will take measures to ensure security and stability in the country.

However, the opposition has said the government is using violence to suppress its opposition and has called for international support to help stabilize the country.

Judge's Injunction

The judge has issued an injunction against the lot division in the area. The injunction states that the lot division is illegal and must be stopped.

The judge's decision was based on the fact that the lot division was not properly planned or executed. The judge ruled that the lot division was a violation of the city's zoning laws and that it was not in the best interest of the community.

The judge's decision has been met with mixed reactions. Some people support the decision and see it as a step toward protecting the community. Others are upset by the decision and feel that it is an infringement on their rights.
