Work Without Precedent –

What Would Make America Surrender?

J. M. ROBERTS

Assistant Professor of Political Science

Anyone who would try to figure out why it is that America surrenders to a foreign power would have at least three questions to answer.

The first question would be: How will the war go? The second would be: Will the war go on long enough to make it worthwhile? And the third would be: What will it take to make it worthwhile?

For the last two questions there is no more than a reasonable chance that the American people will answer by the first. They have already answered the third, and they are on the verge of answering the second.

The answer is: In the long run, the United States has only a limited number of resources with which to wage war, and it is not in its nature to be a nation that is willing to fight for the sake of fighting. But if it can be shown that it is necessary to fight in order to preserve the nation, then the people will be willing to make the sacrifice.

But until there is a clear understanding of the situation, it is impossible to determine whether the war will go on long enough to make it worthwhile.
