The Future of Education

Our community and our country approach the threshold of a new school year. Since the inception of our republic, education has been a top priority in the life of our people. At no time in history has our concern been more pronounced than at this moment. At least three sobering questions are already thrusting themselves on our concerted thinking:

1. Are our schools as good as they should be?
2. Are our schools as good as Russia's?
3. Are we getting better or worse?

In the inception of our republic, education has always been a prime goal. It has always been of special importance to our leaders.

Inception of our Republic

The need of education for the intellectual and moral development of our people has always been a prime goal. It has been of special importance to our leaders. In the past, we have always met this need with enthusiasm and determination.

Although Americans seem to have a penchant for only acting when the situation is dire, we are glad to see that there are some signs of improvement. In particular, we are heartened by the recent developments in the educational system.

In this day and age, education is crucial for our future. It is the key to the success of our nation. We must ensure that our schools are as good as possible.

High school to college education is a crucial step in the development of our youth. It is the foundation upon which their future careers will be built.
