Greeek system faces campus revolution

SMALL, QUIET REVOLUTIONS are taking place daily in American society. Some colleges and universities are full of the spirit of the times. "The academic demands made upon students have educational purposes of the highest order," says Dr. Ralph McCall, A member of the editorial board of the University of Illinois Daily Iowan, "and if we fail to realize the educational purposes of the college we are not fully realizing its purpose."

The encouraging fact about this report is its primary purpose: the "academic demands on students have educational purposes of the highest order."

And the purpose of the American college is to prepare students for life, not for work. The American college is a place where students can learn how to think, not what to think. The American college is a place where students can learn how to live, not how to die. The American college is a place where students can learn how to serve, not how to be served.

The American college is a place where students can learn how to be free, not how to be controlled. The American college is a place where students can learn how to be independent, not how to be dependent. The American college is a place where students can learn how to be creative, not how to be imitative.

And the American college is a place where students can learn how to be human, not how to be machines. The American college is a place where students can learn how to be whole, not how to be fragmented.

The American college is a place where students can learn how to be meaningful, not how to be meaningless. The American college is a place where students can learn how to be significant, not how to be insignificant.

The American college is a place where students can learn how to be real, not how to be unreal. The American college is a place where students can learn how to be alive, not how to be dead.

The American college is a place where students can learn how to be free, not how to be imprisoned. The American college is a place where students can learn how to be happy, not how to be unhappy.

The American college is a place where students can learn how to be strong, not how to be weak. The American college is a place where students can learn how to be healthy, not how to be sick.

The American college is a place where students can learn how to be wise, not how to be foolish. The American college is a place where students can learn how to be competent, not how to be incompetent.

And the American college is a place where students can learn how to be human, not how to be inhuman. The American college is a place where students can learn how to be real, not how to be unreal. The American college is a place where students can learn how to be alive, not how to be dead.
Counterfeits for college?

UNIONDALE - Gary Lee Edsheart, 18, of Des Moines was arrested here Tuesday night after authorities said he had tried to sell $150 worth of counterfeit checks.

Edsheart, who was a junior at Des Moines Central High School, was caught Monday night when he presented a check to a local grocery store.

On the front of the $150 check, written out to Des Moines Central High School, was a line that read: "This check is for the 1970-71 school year." The line was crossed out, however, and the check was accepted by the store.
