Racial Violence Clams; Cities Keep On Guard

WASHINGTON — Congress passed a major civil rights bill today, ending a tense five-month debate on federal legislation to combat racial discrimination in housing.

The bill, known as the Civil Rights Act of 1968, was signed into law by President Lyndon B. Johnson at a ceremony in the East Room of the White House.

The measure, which had been stalled in Congress for months, was finally approved after a series of negotiations between the president and congressional leaders.

In his remarks, President Johnson praised the bipartisan effort that led to the bill's passage.

"This is a landmark day in our nation's history," he said. "This bill will ensure that all Americans have equal access to the American Dream."
