Eisenhower's "Watergate" ~

Editor's Note: The following article is reprinted with permission of Human Events magazine.

Generally involved in the shuffle of cover-up lies and other documents during the Watergate testimony of former President Lyndon B. Johnson was David C. Engels, a government attorney. As the committee was questioning Dean, Mr. Engels was apparently present, and it is likely that he was present when a memorandum of conversation with Mr. Dean was transmitted to the committee.

The Washington Times is not aware of any other direct evidence of the alleged conversation involving Mr. Dean and Mr. Engels. However, there is considerable speculation that the conversation may have taken place, and that it may have involved some kind of cooperation in the cover-up of the Watergate affair.

During the appearances of John Dean, the committee's questions were directed primarily to the role of the President in the cover-up. Mr. Dean testified that he had been involved in the cover-up from the beginning, and that he had been aware of the illegal activities at all times.

The committee's questioning was thorough, and it is likely that the conversation with Mr. Dean may have been one of the topics discussed. However, the committee has not been able to confirm this, and it is possible that the conversation may have taken place in a different context.

Regardless of the outcome of the conversation, it is clear that Mr. Dean was an important figure in the Watergate affair. His testimony has been crucial in the investigation of the affair, and his role in the cover-up has been a subject of intense interest.

The committee's actions have been widely applauded, and it is likely that the conversation with Mr. Dean may have played a significant role in the committee's work. The committee's continued efforts to uncover the truth of the Watergate affair are to be commended.

Poll finds politicians lack trust of British

LONDON (AP) — British voters believe their politicians lack trustworthiness, according to a new survey published Friday.

The survey by the British Council, a cultural organization, found that 75% of Britons believe their politicians are not trustworthy, while only 25% believe they are trustworthy.

The survey also found that younger Britons are more likely to believe that politicians are trustworthy, with 80% of those under 30 believing this compared to 60% of those over 60.

The survey was conducted among a representative sample of 1,000 adults in Great Britain and aimed to assess public attitudes towards politicians and their trustworthiness.

The results suggest that there is a significant lack of trust in politicians in the UK, with younger generations being particularly critical.

This is concerning for democracy, as trust in politicians is vital for the functioning of the political system. Without trust, citizens are less likely to participate in democratic processes and more likely to engage in other forms of political participation or disengage altogether.

The findings of this survey highlight the need for politicians to reestablish trust with their constituents. This could be achieved through increased transparency, responsiveness to public concerns, and a focus on delivering on key policy pledges.

Overall, the survey provides a valuable insight into the current state of public trust in politicians in the UK, and the challenges that lie ahead for political leaders in rebuilding public confidence.

The University of Iowa Civil Corps Speech Pathologist, Ken Kersting, was in Seoul, Korea, last week to give a speech on the importance of early childhood education. He was also there to help teach the Koreans about the importance of early childhood education.

Kersting had been in Korea for three years, developing a program to help Korean children. The program involves training Korean teachers to work with children who have speech and language disorders.

"We're trying to change the culture in Korea," Kersting said. "We want to help Korean parents understand the importance of early childhood education and the role it plays in their children's development."
