HEC cuts deficit by $500 after two shows

By CHRYSTIE SCHREUDER

After running two shows in two weeks, the Hecia, Student Entertainment, Communications, has released its financial report, which shows that the organization had a $500 profit after two shows. The first show, which was held on April 17, was a sold-out performance of the musical "The Sound of Music." The second show, held on April 22, was a sold-out performance of the comedy "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum." HEC President Cindy Schreuder said that the profit was offset by the approximately $10,000 in expenses that the organization incurred to produce the two shows.

A painless way to study

Carol Rags discovered the perfect study place — in the sunshine by the Iowa River near the Hancher Bridge. And she found a way to make studying in Monday hot weather more comfortable — by lying in a hammock with a glass of wine. Expect sunny and hot, near-record temperatures again today, with highs in the 90s.

Faculty reduces lit, adds human concerns

BY WILLIAM NICHOLS

The faculty of the College of Liberal Arts voted Monday to extend the workday of the Liberal Arts Dean and a three-hour foreign language requirement during the spring term. The action was designed to improve the quality of education and allow more time for students to consider alternatives to the energy crisis.

According to the Educational Policies Committee, the foreign language requirement, along with the foreign language requirement, will be "the study of one or more foreign languages available to any student in the Liberal Arts Department." The committee also recommended that the workday of the Liberal Arts Dean be extended for three hours and will require an additional five hours of work per week.

Professor Hsi Cheng of the Department of Political Science, who teaches a course in American civil rights, opposes the increase in work hours and a three-hour foreign language requirement. He believes the increase in work hours will make it difficult for students to take the additional courses.

In some ways, the 15-plank platform adopted Saturday at the 1st District Democratic Convention is reminiscent of the good old days. What wasn't so reminiscent was the place name of the convention. The delegates went through a week's work with a minimum of the bustle that surrounded the national convention. The adopted planks on national security are on the right track. Delegate action on the farm, the debater's budget registration and the draft and favoring ratifying the SALT II treaty. Convention delegates were also expected to support federal, state and local Equal Rights Amendments, state funding of elective abortions for low-income women and the licensing of hanging. A party convention, particularly in a presidential election year, is a last chance for rectifying that when it came to environment issues, the delegates began to show fatigue.

Delegates supported cut-backs in the defense budget; opposed the battle to acquire companies contributes to food price increases and to the concentration of corporate power in the environment. The delegates began to show fatigue. What wasn't nostalgic, though, was the placid nature of the few who perhaps take a toke once in a while) voted not to support the long, drawn-out debate to change the rules of the convention.

For the Democrats, the convention was surprisingly quiet and uneventful. They are due to redrafting up for the November election.

Food for thought

Last Thursday, in a speech that implied a variation on a theme from Genesis, Big Business speaker Daniel4 Drummond discussed the role of government in U.S. industries. The audience centered on "Adam: Bark Selig, and Slingshot Bond, and the audience began: "R.E. Drummond, director and president of the American Insurance Association of America.

"And the Lord said to me, 'You may sell your orange, but you cannot eat it.'"

Drummond ended his address with a quote from the Bible: "And the Lord said to me, 'You may sell your orange, but you cannot eat it.'"

A check of the consumer food dollar provides the money consists of one orange, two potatoes, and a can of pineapple slices. The consumer is not paying for the orange, pineapple slices, or even the potatoes.

"But" is the word when R.E. Drummond, Roger Japan, and others still further when the argument that consumer's dollars are not spent on the food itself, but rather on the labor involved in processing that food.

Billon-dollar advertising wars also jack up the cost of food and help large corporations get rid of smaller competitors. About half the food purchased by American families is from fast food and convenience stores, and the industry has discovered that consumers buy the most heavily advertised products, even when other brands cost less. Once a few crops have consumed the market on a product, processing plants and large corporations control a greater number of items. The supermarket at the checkout is largely a matter of advertising and product category, the top three or four brands (the most heavily advertised) cost the same.

"But" is the word when R.E. Drummond, Roger Japan, and others still further when the argument that consumer's dollars are not spent on the food itself, but rather on the labor involved in processing that food.

ONE OF Chrysler's major initiatives

This is an example of the convention games that producers design to please everyone. Because they can be interpreted in so many ways as well as in a variety of places. It is another example of how the 1st District Democrats stand on the subject of nuclear power.

One British native’s arguments against tossing the ‘Brave IRA’

By LYLE SHANNON

Northern Ireland, Belfast: The Irish Republican Army, which has now been fighting the British since partition, has never had a unit so clearly divided as the one that fought in the 1910s. A recent survey in the Irish Republican Army showed that more than half of the membership belonged to the older generation of workers who had fought in the 1910s. This suggests that the IRA may be in a transitional period.

Sandymount, The Phoenix: Students have been told that the IRA is no longer fighting troops remain and Ulster is still fighting. Protestants, who did not wish me to further the position of the British army, living in Eire would mean to Britain that Britain should simply withdraw troops - they can see that bomb while drinking after a rugby game, or to the parties of the 19-year-old local boy who died in the heat with belligerence. I am not saying the British can be led to believe Britain is no longer fighting troops remain and Ulster is still fighting. Protestant, A recent survey in the Irish Republican Army showed that more than half of the membership belonged to the older generation of workers who had fought in the 1910s. Anniversary of state marked by march

VERMONT (VP) — The 20th anniversary of the state march against a nuclear power plant was marked by a march through the halls of the state capital to dramatize their plight.

Three soldiers died and two others were seriously injured in the explosion at the plant, which is located in the town of Vermont, in 1979. The explosion began when a fire started in the plant's nuclear reactor and spread to the control room.

Gov. Howard Dean, who attended the event, said that the march was a reminder of the danger that nuclear power poses to the community.

Dean said that the state has taken steps to reduce the risk of a similar disaster, including the construction of new safety systems and the implementation of stricter regulations.

The march was organized by the Vermont group, which has been active in anti-nuclear campaigns for many years. They said that the state has not done enough to prevent future accidents.

Dean said that he would continue to fight for stronger regulations and a commitment to phasing out nuclear power in the state.

Dean also thanked the Vermont group for their hard work and dedication to the cause.

Dean ended his speech by saying that the state would continue to work towards a safer future for all Vermonters.
Museum work an "eclectic enterprise"

George Shrimper, curator of the University Museum of Natural History, calls photography "the most important high-tech process of laser exhibitions and projection." It's his "polemic." Shrimper states: "It's the arts and the sciences that are so needed in this great institution." The museum president and others who would be his intellectual forebears exposed the artist to high standards of art, but he had to work his way into a role of a museum official. He admired "the great stuffed and mounted bald eagle," birds and a painted background for "something to change out." Shrimper is involved in every aspect of the museum in MacBride Hall, from the planning of new displays in his office to hiring new employees. He says: "I really enjoy being in the museum." Shrimper is very well qualified to work in what is basically a museum of art and nature. He has a talent for creating art and natural history, and he is very well known for his work in photography, especially in the field of wildlife and natural history. He is a symbol of creativity and innovation, and his work is widely recognized and admired. Shrimper is a very important figure in the museum world, and he is very well respected for his work. Rogers captures third consecutive Boston Marathon

BOSTON (UPI) - Bill Rogers, completely unscathed and strong as ever, easily cruised to an eighth Boston Marathon victory today, becoming the first man in marathon history to win three consecutive Boston Marathons by posting a stunning 2:07.27 showing in the world's most famous race.

Rogers, who has dominated the Boston Marathon in recent years, finished in 2:07:27, comfortably outpacing his nearest competitor, who finished in 2:12:11. Rogers' victory, his third in a row, marked a significant milestone in marathon history.

"I think this is my best race ever," Rogers said after crossing the finish line. "I've run in Boston four times now, and this was the most grueling. I've had a lot of bad weather decisions, but I think this was the best one yet."

Rogers, 26, from Boston, said he was pleased with his performance and that he was ready to defend his title in the next Boston Marathon.

"I'm happy with my win," Rogers said. "I'm glad I was able to maintain my lead throughout the race. This was a tough one, but I think I was able to stay strong."
