State archaeologist digs Iowa

Iowa State Archaeologist Dare Anderson looks over some arrowheads uncovered in his laboratory located in eastern Iowa. Anderson said the artifacts were found in Lyon County in northwest Iowa. One reason people participate in the project is for the fun and enjoyment of archaeology certification. This can be done by spending a specified amount of time excavating, surveying or interpreting sites.

These certified lay people become the equivalent of a certified archaeologist for a newspaper. "They are seen on the side of the road," Anderson said. "People call us from all over the state, from Europe, and from the Midwest." Anderson said he and his office have been surveyed archaeological.

The office sponsors an annual week in which open to the public.

In addition, to keeping track of findings, they keep a library of documents, books, books, reports, excavations, and records. Anderson said the office is looking for people who are interested in participating with the work on the Iowa University's program.

Gail Garfield-Schwartz, who was the top of the Eiffel Tower, few Parisians know about the half a million artifacts in her office. This office oversees one of the nation's largest archaeological programs.

She also said the office has a large number of artifacts, but most of them are not known to the public. Anderson said he and his office have been surveyed archeological.

Union book co-op is alternative for students scouting a bargain

By Carolyn Hendrick
Editorial page writer

"Even on a slow day, we'll have 50 to 60 customers" at the CAC.

Book Co-op, says store manager Steve Pajunen, "On a fast day, we see thousands."

The problem more unique to cooperatives is in the public relations.

Pajunen said, "We can't reach new students soon enough. He's working on publicity efforts aimed at new students and faculty." Pajunen attributes part of the sales drop to publication delays. He said that the cooperative is sensitive to the needs of students who are buying late. The cooperative recently began a newsletter to help students keep track of their book orders.

Several students said they were aware of the cooperative's problems and said they would continue to support it. One student said, "I bought my books at the CAC because they are cheaper. I don't want to spend more money than I have to." Another student said, "I like the cooperative because it is a good deal. I would be willing to pay more for it if I could." A third student said, "I don't care about the cooperative's problems. I just want my books." These students said they would continue to support the cooperative even if it meant paying more for their books.

The cooperative also faces challenges from other similar organizations. One student said, "I buy my books at the CAC because it is cheaper. I would be willing to pay more for it if I could." Another student said, "I don't care about the cooperative's problems. I just want my books." These students said they would continue to support the cooperative even if it meant paying more for their books.

WASHINGTON - A great constitutional convulsion has been set off in Iowa, a state renowned for its middle-of-the-road tendencies. The convulsion resulted from the recent resignation of the President of the Student Senate, a body established to represent the interests of students at the University of Iowa. The resignation sparked a debate on the role of students in the university community and raised questions about the advisability of having student representatives on the university board. The incident highlighted the tensions between students and university authorities, and it prompted a reexamination of the ways in which students are involved in the governance of the institution.

The Student Senate's resignation was a result of a growing dissatisfaction among students with the university administration's handling of various issues, including academic freedom, budget cuts, and the administration's failure to address student concerns effectively. The Senate's statement expressed its belief that the university was not functioning in the best interests of its students and that the Senate should not remain a powerless body, incapable of bringing about change.

The university administration's response to the Senate's resignation was initially defensive, arguing that the Senate's actions were unwarranted and that the university was committed to improving its relationship with students. However, the administration's response did little to quell the student backlash, and the incident highlighted the need for a more open and transparent approach to governance.

The Iowa incident was a crisis in student governance, with several implications for the university and for the broader educational community. It underscored the importance of student representation in institutional decision-making and raised questions about the effectiveness of student unions in advocating for student interests. The incident also highlighted the need for a more inclusive approach to governance, with greater collaboration between students and university authorities.

Despite the initial tension, the incident ultimately resulted in a more open and inclusive approach to governance at the University of Iowa, with student representatives playing a more active role in decision-making. The incident also sparked a broader debate on the role of students in institutional governance, with the university and students working to develop new mechanisms for engagement and cooperation.

Fifteen years ago the University of Iowa was crippled by the severance of their association with the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees. The union had represented 13 percent of the university's workforce, but the institution's three-tiered labor agreement with the United Auto Workers made it impossible for the university to continue with three-tiered contracts. The union's leadership and membership believed that the university was simply trying to cut costs in an effort to maintain a level of service that was consistent with the institution's mission.

As a result, the university entered into a series of discussions with the United Auto Workers, which eventually led to the formation of the United Auto Workers Local 186, which represents 13 percent of the university's workforce. The union has played a crucial role in negotiating contracts that provide for fair wages and benefits for its members, as well as in advocating for the rights of students, faculty, and staff.

Today, the United Auto Workers Local 186 continues to play a vital role in representing the interests of its members at the University of Iowa. The union is committed to ensuring that its members receive fair wages and benefits, as well as to advocating for the rights of students, faculty, and staff. The union's leadership is dedicated to working collaboratively with the university to ensure that all members of the university community are treated fairly and with respect. The United Auto Workers Local 186 is an important voice in the ongoing conversation about the future of higher education in Iowa.

Big men dominate selections in NBA draft

BY JEFF STRATTON, Assistant Sports Editor

The NBA Draft, officially called the National Basketball Association Draft, is an annual event where National Basketball Association (NBA) teams select eligible players for their rosters. The draft is a crucial part of NBA operations, allowing teams to acquire new talent and set the foundation for their future success. The event is widely watched and provides a platform for potential players to showcase their skills and a chance for teams to build their rosters with promising talent.

Hale signs with Iowa spikers

According to Iowa Coach Randy Stewart, Carly Hale of Brandonville, Ill., has signed a national letter of intent to play volleyball for the University of Iowa.

Hale, a junior, transferring to Iowa from Illinois Central College, will be eligible for the next volleyball season in 1985. Stewart said that he hopes to sign Hale as an option to deal with the loss of top players.

Tulane will not re-establish basketball

NEW ORLEANS(UPI)—Tulane University President Kenneth Kelly, who eliminated the school's basketball program in 1979, has said that the university does not expect the return of Green Wave basketball.

"I don't know of any organized group trying to bring Tulane basketball back to Tulane," Kelly said. "I would not recommend the resumption of basketball unless there was a dramatic change in the national environment.

And while I'd love to see that take place, I really can't help in getting the necessary funds together."}

Artists’ space forum tonight

By Nancy Olivier

The Arts Center of
Iowa County

The Arts Center of
Iowa County will hold an open house tonight from 6-9 p.m. in conjunction with its current exhibit, "Artists’ Space," exploring the interaction between art objects and the spaces they inhabit. The forum will be conducted at the Arts Center, which is located on the second floor of the Jefferson State College Foundation Building, 106 northwest Second St., Iowa City, Iowa.

The forum offers the opportunity to engage with the seven area artists whose works are featured in the exhibit. Although the show is primarily concerned with the relationship between art and its environment, it is believed that the forum is a natural way in which a work of art can become a container for both the artist’s and the observer’s personal experiences.

The EXHIBIT is on view at the Arts Center through July. For further information, call 335-7071.

Imagery is an important element of Dylan's work, whether it be the visual images that illustrate his music or the story lines that wrap around his songs. The artist is interested in the visual aspect of music as much as the aural. According to the Daily Iowan, Dylan's latest album is "an offbeat record, no wonder it was the

I think I, like millions of others, came out okay despite being exposed to rock 'n' roll music. In fact, I'd say the experience has been an altogether beneficial one, especially sexual activities and drug use have been downplayed in my life to rock music, and it is perhaps true that I became more accepting of those things because of it.
