Pentagon scandal unfolds
WASHINGTON—The resignation of an alleged lurker and head in Pentagon expense-leeching, the "executive" assistant to the secretary of defense, was on the shakes of this morning's early newspapers.

According to reports, Assistant Secretary of Defense Lawrence "Chester" Euler resigned under pressure. The assistant to the secretary of defense is a position that is often referred to as the "executive" assistant to the secretary of defense.

Euler is suspected of having obtained funds for personal use, including travel expenses, by pretending to be a member of the military.

According to sources close to the investigation, Euler had been using a government credit card to make unauthorized purchases.

Euler's resignation comes after a series of allegations about the Pentagon's spending practices, which have raised questions about the department's oversight.

The Pentagon has been under scrutiny for its handling of funds, particularly in light of the department's role in providing support to U.S. armed forces overseas.

Euler's resignation is likely to prompt further scrutiny of the Pentagon's financial management, as well as calls for increased oversight and accountability.

The Pentagon scandal is just the latest in a series of high-profile cases of alleged mismanagement and waste at the department.

System failure

Though it is still too early in the developing Pentagon procurements to be able to accurately judge who is to blame — who is culpable, who will be indicted, what the lessons and implications will be for the future of the defense industry — it is not too early to see the larger, emerging picture. And to see one’s surprise, it is not a pretty one.

We have always known defense procurement — indeed, defense decision-making at all levels of government — to be driven by special-interest groups. Defense contractors line both sides of the political spectrum, and an enormous funding stream from districts where weapons are developed, manufactured or deployed fuels the passion and drive of the assertive legislator and the local contractor anxious to work together in the business of waging war, compete with their competitors, and maintain local jobs. In the system of these various subsystems and parts of the whole, it is dealing with which various interests are vying for the bigger share.

If everybody played by the rules and the rules themselves were developed, being developed, it would be much, much easier. Then the special-interest competition in weapons procurement would be much, much easier, too. If the competition for defense contracts would likely yield better, cheaper weapons, weaponized and deployed where they would do the most good.

But of course, nobody plays that way. In what has been described as a "hostility of dollars, millions contending," defense contractors have conspired and legislator and Pentagon officials — in a hodge-podge system — have created an environment of working corruption in the first place and time again, this has produced faulty, and at large cost, overruns, while meanwhile $1 to $6 billion dollars are spent annually on the Congressionally mandated procurements.

Clearly the system does not work, and it has not been working as long as time. From the halls of the Pentagon in the halls of Congress in your neighborhoods bomb factory, the ultimate secretive organization, and a country which devotes 6.5 percent of its gross national product to defense is a system that is about to come apart in order to provide the wrong weapons to the wrong people at the wrong time.

It is true that the American Indians have been made to feel like the wrong people at the wrong time. Much of the federal money changes hands, and, as we are learning, very little of it is in the hands of the Native American people.

Unjust sentence

"We are obviously very disappointed by the hardships of the sentenced people." Mario Beauregard, the parish priest of the Church of St. Michael the Archangel in Cleveland, said last week, after a son of his was sentenced to four months in jail, fined, and ordered to perform 300 hours of community service by Judge Francis McCaffrey's sentencing on August 13, 1986.

The judge, in his decision, said that an Indian settler had been convicted of violation of the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act. It was decided that the cost of incarcerating the offender would be a heavy fine and 300 hours of community service.

Obviously, the sentence is unjust, the parish priest stated, "It is a sentence that is very serious in nature. Any time controlled substances are used and sold in one's life, there goes a price to pay if the judge is not satisfied.

Additionally, the priest added that the family was going to suffer serious in nature. Any time controlled substances are used and sold in one's life, there goes a price to pay if the judge is not satisfied. The family involved, including the child's family, will suffer for a long time because of the judge's decision."

Other sentences, such as this, are seen as unjust.

Who could ask for more than Cleveland?

You may tell me that the American Indians have their privileges as a minority group, and that there's a lot being done for them. But it is part of America's story that cannot be narrated with pride. The way the Indians were subdued is sad, the way the inequitable agreements forced on them is sad.

However admirably their reservations are being developed, it is a shame that the land they once had the freedom of the land are now confined in so many ways. They should be integrated into the mainstream of America. That is the only American way.

The campaign beat goes on

The campaign to beat goes on, and the American people are handsome.

Do you remember when the number of presidential candidates increased from 12 to 154? Yes, it's back, and it's looking like an amazing new election. More than the 1986 presidential campaign will be complete with a Democratic line-up of the new generation. It's going to be exciting.

You and I, the millions that make this campaign the most beloved in decades can be counted on. We have a great deal at stake, a great deal at stake. To vote, to vote, to vote. We have a great deal at stake, a great deal at stake.

It's true. But it's also true. And it's true that Americans are divided, and there are more of them than there are of us. And there's more of us, and there's more of us. And there's more of us.

As for the American Indians, they have never in question. But it is part of America's story. They have always known defense procurement as the wrong people at the wrong time.

Haitian president continues reforms

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti—President Jean-Bertrand Aristide made another political move aimed at persuading the Haitian people to accept his government's efforts to stabilize the country, officials said Wednesday.

Mr. Aristide released six political prisoners during a ceremony held Wednesday in the countryside just outside Port-au-Prince.

The move was intended to show the Haitian people that the government was committed to reforming the country and to ending violence.

However, some Haitians said they were not convinced by the move and remained skeptical about the government's plans for the future.

Several Haitians were seen leaving the ceremony in the countryside just outside Port-au-Prince.

They appeared to be in good spirits and were waving as they left.

The government has been working to stabilize the country since it took power in 1986, following a military coup that overthrew President Jean-Claude Duvalier.

The coup had brought widespread human rights abuses and political instability.

President Aristide came to power in 1986 through a popular uprising and has been attempting to stabilize the country and bring peace to the nation.

However, his efforts have been met with resistance from some segments of the population, who are wary of the government's intentions.

The government has been trying to implement political and economic reforms to bring stability to the country.

However, many Haitians say they have not seen enough progress and are concerned about their future.

The government has faced challenges in implementing reforms due to the country's troubled history and the challenges of stabilizing a war-torn nation.

The government has been working to improve the country's infrastructure, education, and health care systems.

However, many Haitians say they have not seen enough progress and are concerned about their future.

Israelis shun death 3 schools

JERUSALEM (AP) — The army announced Sunday that it will evacuate three schools closed by authorities because they were used as bases by Palestinian guerrillas.

It was the first time the Israeli military has clearly stated its intention to evacuate the schools, which have become a symbol of Palestinian resistance.

The announcement came after the Israeli government decided to pull its troops out of the occupied territories.

The move was seen as a step toward ending the conflict with the Palestinians.

The Israeli government has been under growing pressure to withdraw from the occupied territories.

However, many Israelis say they do not want to see a divided Jerusalem and fear that pulling out would undermine their claims to the city.

The Israeli military has been battling Palestinian guerrillas for years in the occupied territories.

The conflict has been raging since the 1967 war, when Israel captured the West Bank and Gaza Strip.
