WASHINGTON (AP) - President George Bush has opposed in Congress Monday to accept his call for billions of dollars for the Jetpack, a short-lived but controversial proposal that his administration had talked about for several years.

Bush, in a letter to Congress, said he did not think the technology was ready for production and that he was opposed to the $70 million program.

Bush's decision could mean the end of plans for the Jetpack, a futuristic device that was designed to allow people to fly through the air like a jet plane.

The Jetpack, which was developed by a company called Skyss, was designed to be used for military and civilian purposes. It was supposed to be able to carry a person up to 50 miles per hour and was supposed to be able to take off and land in seconds.

But in recent weeks, the Jetpack program has been the target of criticism from some members of Congress and from the public.

The Army's top officials have expressed concerns about the cost and effectiveness of the Jetpack, and some members of Congress have called for the program to be canceled.

In his letter to Congress, Bush said he was opposed to the program because it was too expensive and too risky.

He also said that the technology was not ready for production and that it was not clear whether it would be safe to use.

Bush said he wanted to see more research done before any money was spent on the Jetpack program.

The letter, which was made public Monday, is the latest in a series of oppositions to the Jetpack program by President Bush and his administration.

Last month, the Defense Secretary, Donald Rumsfeld, said he was opposed to the Jetpack because it was too expensive and too risky.

And earlier this year, the Army's top officials said they were concerned about the cost and effectiveness of the Jetpack and were considering取消 the program.

Bush's letter to Congress, which was obtained by The New York Times, was one of the first communications from the White House on the issue.

UI medical researchers seek answers to weight problems

Current study points to traits shared by successful dieters

John Franklin

The project seeks to answer why some people can fly like a plane, and others can’t.

In the search for a way to explain why some people can fly like a plane, and others can’t, researchers at the UI College of Medicine and the UI Health Care system are working to understand the underlying mechanisms of weight regulation.

Many people are interested in understanding why some individuals are able to maintain a healthy weight throughout their lives, while others struggle with obesity.

The researchers believe that understanding these mechanisms could lead to the development of new treatments for weight loss and obesity.

The study involves participants who are being followed over time, and their progress is being monitored through regular check-ups.

The researchers are also interested in understanding the genetic and environmental factors that contribute to weight regulation.

They hope that their findings will help to identify new targets for intervention and prevention strategies for weight-related disorders.

The results of the study are expected to be published in the near future.

No consensus

After a damaging U.S.-Supreme Court ruling on the abortion issue, it is natural for the two major political parties to pursue their goals in this area. Both the Republicans and the Democrats are committed to their objectives and are likely to face some opposition. The Supreme Court's decision may have far-reaching implications and could set a precedent for similar cases in the future.

A NO-TALK task currently studying the issue will probably recognize its complexity and recommend the organization use its resources to support the task force. If the task force advises the NOW to form a third party, it will have overruled two earlier advisory actions in the United States. The NOW might adopt any third party, and, in doing so, might pass legislation. The NOW might pass legislation. The NOW might pass legislation.

Gun debate goes nowhere fast

William F. Buckley Jr.

This magazine's gun editorial, however, is one of the few about the right to bear arms that were in any way recent. In every respect of the issue, this magazine has been heard and is considered one of the major forces in the gun control debate.

In respect to this magazine's view of the gun issue, we are aware that a few steps the gun issue is being handled by the gun industry, and, therefore, the gun issue is being handled by the gun industry.

The gun issue is being handled by the gun industry, and, therefore, the gun issue is being handled by the gun industry.

The Right Thing

Malicious insolence

Editorial

The current gun debate is no more about the right to bear arms than it is about the right to bear arms. It has never failed. The gun industry's efforts to change the gun issue have always been met with the public's demand that the gun issue is being handled by the gun industry, and, therefore, the gun issue is being handled by the gun industry.

The gun issue is being handled by the gun industry, and, therefore, the gun issue is being handled by the gun industry.

Chinese delegates walk out of conference

As the foreign minister of the People's Republic of China, Li Peng, walked out of the 40th Session of the UN General Assembly on October 10, 1994, he was being applauded by delegates from friendly nations who applauded for China's strong stand against the UN resolution condemning China's treatment of its ethnic minorities.

The resolution, which was passed by the UN General Assembly, was widely condemned by Chinese delegates who said it was an "unjust and unreasonable" attack on China's internal affairs.

The resolution, sponsored by the United States, was condemned by China as a "mishandled and unfortunate" proposal that would undermine the UN's role as a forum for international cooperation.

"We have consistently opposed such resolutions," Li said in a statement. "We will not hesitate to use all necessary means to defend our legitimate national rights and interests."
Debate agreement with Mexico now up to commercial banks

WASHINGTON (AP) — The administration and Mexico are nearing agreement on the new Mexican debt restructuring plan to end the debt-strapped Third World debt strategy, but only if Mexico agrees to some new debt-reduction terms.

Several Congressmen of both parties have told NBC News they opposed the new agreement with Mexico because of some of the debt-reduction terms.

Treasury Secretary Nicholas Brady said Monday the administration has reached the agreement with Mexico that would allow the debt-strapped Third World debt strategy, but the terms might be changed if Mexico agrees to some new debt-reduction terms.

Brady also said the agreement would need to be renegotiated if Mexico's debt-reduction terms are too extreme.

The terms of the agreement with Mexico are not yet publicly available, but they are expected to be announced soon.

Influence at heart of HUD probe

WASHINGTON (AP) — A former federal housing official and now a prominent policy analyst is facing questioning in a political scandal that has put a special emphasis on the need for a special investigation.

The scandal involves the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD), which is responsible for overseeing the nation's housing policies.

The scandal involves a political appointment by a previous administration, which has put the agency under scrutiny.

The investigation is being led by a special counsel appointed by the Department of Justice, who is charged with determining whether there is evidence of wrongdoing.

Shrimpers win suspension of turtle rule

WASHINGTON (AP) — The administration on Monday temporarily suspended regulations requiring shrimpers to install turtle excluder devices in their nets for the first time since the federal government imposed a 1985 moratorium on commercial shrimping.

The regulations were put in place to protect endangered sea turtles from being killed by shrimping operations.

The suspension was announced by Interior Secretary Manuel Lujan, who said the agency is conducting an environmental impact statement to determine whether the regulations are necessary.

Kids take parents to see Ringo

DALLAS (AP) — Ringo Starr reached out to his first-ever concert crowd, but the crowd was asleep when he went for the rock and roll. And he didn't even have to perform.

Ringo, 69, opened the first show of his 50-city summer tour by singing "It Don't Come Easy After". At his record, on "Yellow Submarine," he asked to the electric version of a band that was a graying generation of rock stars. They included former Beatles collaborator Billy Preston, who played the organ as "Fat" in "If I Don't Melt," during John, Paul and George's famous performance of "Yellow Submarine.

Starr, who is now better known for his work as a solo artist, returned to his roots with a cover of "Yellow Submarine," a song he wrote with Lennon in 1966.
