The Daily Iowan

Local organizations are joining forces to make the holiday season a little brighter for children living in local homeless shelters, day care centers, and diaper baskets and toys for babies. The Sixth annual food and toy distribution is sponsored by The Salvation Army Corps, 510 S. Gilbert St., the Cedar Rapids Police Department, and the Community Action Network, 443 High St. W.

Dinner baskets will include a turkey, a ham, potatoes, chilli, vegetables and ingredients for a dessert. All children will receive a toy with the dinner. The supplies will be distributed beginning Dec. 12, and stops will be made at local businesses, churches, apartment buildings, and child care centers. The supplies will not be available to children who have not been served breakfast. A list of people who might not be able to attend dinner will be made.

Dinner baskets are available to anyone in need. A voluntary, self-identified screening for diet will also be available. The dinner center will not be able to serve anyone who is not an immediate family member of a child.

People interested in donating food to the dinner center must bring food items directly to the Crisis Center or to donation centers at local schools and businesses around the area.

Parents will be able to do the holiday shopping at participating locations. All distribution details are available at Help from the Heart, 3202 Sixth Ave., Suite 100.

The town has been asked by Joint City Council to consider a new tax on alcoholic beverages and are decorated with pink angels that hug the trees. People who wish to donate to the cause must shop at the store.

Texas man tries to push in women-only program

Stefan I. Turek

REUTERS

TEXAS - Steven Voris, a 35-year-old software engineer, is the last of the anti-abortion protesters who have tried to push in the women-only program at the University of Texas at Austin.

Voris, who has been tracking the protests for more than a year, said he was surprised when he heard that the university had decided to allow men to enroll in its women's college.

"This is a victory for us," he said. "We've been fighting this battle for so long, and now we're finally seeing some progress."

Voris, who has been attending the protests for several years, said he was looking forward to seeing how the program would work in practice.

"We're not going to give up now," he said. "We're going to keep fighting until every woman in this country has the right to an education."

University officials said they were pleased with the decision, but acknowledged that there would be some resistance from those who opposed the program.

"We understand that this is a sensitive issue, and we're prepared to handle any challenges that come our way," said a spokesperson for the university.

"We believe that giving women the opportunity to pursue their dreams is a fundamental right, and we're not going to stop until everyone has access to a high-quality education."

In high school, it was cool to hate school and ditch class. Many college graduates will tell you that their years in college are going to last forever. In the midst of their roundings again. How fresh everything looks after the 'film's end but nothing is going to last forever. In the midst of their roundings again.

Some of the most frustrating people to talk to are the ones who can't hold a decent conversation because they never talk to anyone, not even about beer and the more interesting.

Rowland’s article is a defense of his position on the issue of holiday celebrations in America. He argues that our current holiday traditions are in need of reform and improvement.

In his article, Rowland states that the current holiday season is dominated by commercialism and materialism, and that it is important to shift the focus of these celebrations to more meaningful and meaningful values. He suggests that we should celebrate the holidays by reinstating traditional practices, such as family gatherings and church services, and by returning to the roots of our holiday traditions.

Rowland’s arguments are based on his belief that our current holiday celebrations have become too commercialized and materialistic. He argues that we should instead focus on the true meaning of the holidays, which he believes is centered around family and community, rather than on the materialistic excesses of consumerism.

I agree with Rowland’s arguments and feel that they are well taken. It is true that our current holiday celebrations have become too commercialized and materialistic. The holidays should be about spending time with loved ones, sharing traditions, and expressing gratitude for the blessings in our lives, not about buying gifts and filling our homes with material possessions.

The holidays should be a time to reflect on the values that are important to us, and to celebrate the relationships that we hold dear. Instead of focusing on the materialism of the holidays, we should focus on the meaningful aspects of these celebrations, such as spending time with family and friends, sharing traditions, and expressing gratitude.

I hope that we can all come together and work towards a more meaningful and meaningful holiday season, one that is centered around family, community, and the true meaning of the holidays. Let us work towards a holiday season that is free from commercialism and materialism, and one that reflects the true values that are important to us.

Sincerely,

Chiefs stay in playoff race

Stephen Wilson

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — On the cover of last week’s Triple 32 magazine, Joe Montana was shown kicking a field goal. He would have said it was too much of a stretch.

But it was the 26-year-old quarterback who was on the cover just a few weeks ago when the Chiefs were playing in the Super Bowl.

They finished Saturday, Dec. 26, at the Ravens.

To reach their stated goal of the division this year, they had missed by only one game going to the end this season. They are home Sunday at Miami, we’d still have an opportunity to get into the playoffs, but we failed to win the last four straight years and had a losing record to close this season.

That could have tarnished China’s sporting image.

One of the few bright spots for the Chiefs at Miami was wide receiver J.J. Stokes, who caught 10 for 156 yards and a score.

“I thought we could build on that,” coach Sherril Moore said.
