Political powerbroker offers glimpse of Washington trend
Shawn Corbin
The Daily Iowan

One of America's most influential senators shares his wariness over change happening in Washington—and how few new ideas might actually reach the White House.

"It's so easy to forget that we've been here before," he lamented.

Shawn Corbin estimated that what he saw in the Senate was "something of a once-in-a-generation phenomenon."

He noted that the ideological divide now seemed to be growing, and that
"in Washington, we are more divided than ever before." He said,
"I think the American people have become less engaged and less involved in the process," and that
"we are more divided than ever before."

Corbin said that he was concerned about the lack of new ideas coming from Congress and the White House.

"The problem is that we're not coming up with new ideas," he said.
"But there's a lot of talk about new ideas."
