Divers to Flight 800’s black boxes

Divers say footage from black boxes will bring proof of TWA Flight 800 crash

By Mark Buehler

The black boxes' long wait is stripped of the secrecy and hoopla that surrounded the investigation of TWA Flight 800 last year. Now, as the divers say, the video tapes from the two black boxes will bring the proof of the crash.

The investigation began immediately after the crash. The video tape from the boxes, which recorded the flight's engine, communication and navigation systems, was expected to bring whatever clues it held to the surface.

The boxes, which were later cut open at the National Transportation Safety Board's (NTSB) facility, were recovered from the debris field after the July 16, 1996, crash of the Boeing 747-100, NTSB officials said.

The boxes, which are the brains of the plane, had been sitting in the airplane's engine compartment during the crash. They recorded everything from the plane's altitude and speed to the amount of oil and fuel in the tanks.

The boxes also recorded the plane's communications, including conversations between the pilots and control towers.

The boxes were cut open and the video tape was removed. The tape was then sent to the NTSB's facility in Washington, D.C., for analysis.

The NTSB has been analyzing the tape for months, trying to piece together what happened in the seconds before the crash.

But the analysis has been delayed because of the volume of the data. The tape is 70 inches long, and the NTSB has been working with a team of experts to analyze it.

The NTSB has already released some preliminary findings, including that the plane's engines were running normally before the crash.

But the full analysis is not expected to be complete until later this year.

The NTSB has been working with the FAA and the airlines to ensure that the boxes are properly handled and that the data is not lost or tampered with.

The boxes are now housed at the NTSB's facility in Washington, D.C., where they are being stored in a secure, climate-controlled environment.

The NTSB has been working with the FAA to determine the best way to analyze the data and to ensure that the boxes are not tampered with.

The boxes are now being analyzed by a team of experts, including engineers and computer scientists.

The analysis is expected to take several months, and the results are expected to be released in the fall.

In the meantime, the boxes are being stored in a secure, climate-controlled environment.

The rules of this game are its greatest challenge! It's made up of many combinations, so you must first create your own directions. The game is pure chance, so you must be prepared to accept a dice with the wheel on it.

A game of Candy Land is played between two players. The players take turns rolling four dice, the excitement begins. If you roll a double number combination, you may move your piece to the first space that number. The space you land on must be clearly marked on the board. If you do not land on a marked space, you are simply screwed, because there are no moves in the game. If you do land on a marked space, you are given a card, because cards are gone or someone is already there. You must read the card before moving, because there are no moves in the game. If you successfully read the card, you are given the next move. If you do not read the card correctly, you are given a card and must move your piece to the next space. In the event of a tie, the player who rolls the highest number of dice wins.

Senate passes welfare reform bill

Catherine Emrich Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Three-quarters of the Senate voted in favor of welfare reform legislation Wednesday, clearing the way for the House of Representatives to act on the bill and send it to President Clinton, who has said he favors the measure.

The vote of 75-19 came after the Senate approved a major revision to the welfare bill proposed by Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., and Senate Finance Committee ChairmanCharles Grassley, R-Iowa.

The measure would authorize a $140 billion annual welfare program and would provide aid to an estimated 14 million people over the next 10 years.

The bill would provide for open-ended assistance and replace current categorical assistance programs.

The defeat of the amendment was a victory for the Democratic leadership, which had been trying to kill the bill by introducing a series of amendments.

The amendment would have allowed states to keep a smaller percentage of the federal welfare funds.

The vote came after a long debate in which senators from both parties spoke passionately about the issue.

Several senators, including Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., and Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., spoke favorably of the amendment.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the amendment would have been a major victory for the Democratic Party.

Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., said the amendment would have been a major victory for the Republican Party.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said the amendment would have been a major victory for the conservative wing of the Republican Party.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., said the amendment would have been a major victory for the liberal wing of the Democratic Party.

The amendment failed by a vote of 58-36. The measure to pass the bill passed by a vote of 75-19.

The Republican and Democratic National Conventions are a case in point. What they used to be—fireside chats for the rich with a few sound bites for the rest—is a thing of the past. Now, both conventions are long affairs in which the candidates talk about their policies and then leave without really saying much. The press, in turn, prints these speeches and stories about the candidates in the newspapers and on television. The result is a lot of noise and a lot of confusion. People can't even tell who's running for what, let alone who's going to win.

However, I do think that the media is doing a better job of covering the campaigns. They are trying to get the candidates to talk about their ideas and policies, rather than just their personal lives. I also think that the Internet is helping people to learn more about the candidates and their positions. So, while there are still some problems, I'm optimistic that things will get better over time.
Doctors call gymnasts' training 'child abuse'

By Steven Wilkins
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Women's gymnastics is, in long shadowed by attraction to its dual audience: young girls and young boys who look at it as a way to put hard bodies on child abuse, as a way to make a career in the sports. But what gymnasts worry about more are the years of sometimes training some female gymnasts. In the world of sports, it can lead to child abuse, a team of doctors says. They found that coaches, with their controls and pressures, are taking them to the brink of total breakdown.

In a new report being published today, experts say the physical and mental conditions of athletes are growing from putting requirements on gymnasts is too high, leading to emotional disorders, skeletal damage and even serious physical damage from trying to make prepubescent girls look like normal kids. "In this way, the sport is not making advances. It is taking away,

Valfoots causes 'New York Undercover' to halt production

NEW YORK (AP) - A walkout by the cast of Fox's "New York Undercover" over money has forced the show's producers to shut down production.

The actors, Malik Yoba and Michael DeLorenzo, have walked off the set, citing a dispute over salaries.

The author, Wolf said, "I will be speaking on Monday morning about this issue in my office." Wolf, who also wrote the pilot episode, was scheduled to appear on Fox's "Medical Center." He had not returned calls from the network as of Tuesday, executives said.

"We're real excited to bring this to the masses," Wolf said.
