In an attempt to curb the effects of the extended heat wave, MidAmerican Energy officials are encouraging students living in off-campus arrangements for the next academic year to consider moving into the company when their living arrangements for the current academic year presents challenges during this summer of record-setting heat.

For the month of July, MidAmerican Energy has experienced a 12 percent increase in energy demand, it will electronically turn off volunteer condensers on a function of the heat wave in the Midwest, it also the result of an increase in the number of customers by 8,000. That increase is not only customers by a function of the heat wave but also an increase from the summer-saver program.

"We went on last Friday," said Dr. James Walfrid, director of the Iowa City water-treatment plant, one of one of 314 businesses on the program. "We have seen a very high increase in the number of customers.

Abortion protesters raise funds for Emma

BY DAN VALENTINE

As abortion protesters from the Kansas City health of Right-to-Life hand the sidewalk around the Emma Goldman clinic, they're likely to find the same thing they did for the past 20 years, the clinic, 227 N. Iowa Ave., has made use of a fundraising technique called "Pledge-a-Picketer." For every protester appearing at the women's health clinic, donors can purchase an additional trial to donate money for her financial access to women seeking abortion services.

"Pledge-a-Picketer" which was born in the mid-1990s, is not always enough, however, sometimes Emma Goldman employees are forced to turn to law in April 2004, the clinic was forced to a restraining order against abortion protester Dan Halstad, barring him from being within 100 feet of the clinic, after he made a statement against abortion.

The pledge program runs all year long, and anyone wanting to be a one-time donor as well as donors on a monthly basis.

Kathy said the clinic has regular protesters and because of this, they may be overstated, her of donations. She also said the "Pledge-a-Picketer" program is not only for large groups, but "It's when someone comes, especially when someone who knows abortion clinics." Planned Parenthood, 400 Orchard Court, also sees a high amount of donations but does not use the pledge program on a regular basis.

"We rely heavily on security forces to make sure our patients and employees have the necessary security forces. Other physically or emotionally," said the clinic's executive director. "Emma Goldman wants to have their own press and public relations teams to work on financial access to women"

Studies may be overstated, new JAMA report says

By John Haman

Nearly one out of every three published medical studies may be exaggerated or misleading, a new study shows.

The study's results, which were published in the Journal of the American Medical Association, concluded that 16 percent of the study results were later retracted and another 10 percent were "challenged" by further studies.

These numbers led the authors to conclude that about 25 percent of published medical research findings may not hold up.

Donald Heistad, a U.S. professor of internal medicine, was glad to see the study, but he is still a bit skeptical. "It brings to light the problem, but the public and media don't realize," he said.

"There is an inherent probability that some findings will be wrong," he said. "When you have only a few studies, it's bound to be a challenge for some." He added that the media are "in a prime position to make them"

Robert Wallace, a U.S. professor of epidemiology, agreed, but he attributed larger part of the exaggeration to lack of "technical understanding or interpretation of the results."

"Most of the media are pretty responsible, and they don't want to go beyond what the results say," said Wallace. "But there are exceptions that interpret the results." He said he has been on both sides of the issue. He and his colleagues found results during an observational study 25 years ago indicating that estrogen protected the heart from coronary disease. Later, randomized trials contradicted their conclusions, and further research was halted.

Most of the media are pretty responsible and they don't want to go beyond what the results say — they just don't have the technical expertise to interpret the results.

— Robert Wallace, U.S. professor of epidemiology

"There's no great sin in how scientific findings that turn out to be wrong," he said. "(Scientists) put their findings out to be refuted."

The study also emphasized that journals tend to include no great sin as having findings that are new and exciting. Doing this may place additional expectations on researchers.

"It's very difficult for the journals to overstate such findings. They'll focus on providing a positive finding where a therapeutic effect exists," he said. "They won't want to go beyond what the results say, but they'll have an easier time getting a positive finding published."

Both acknowledged the problem, adding that major medical journals take steps to reduce the problem by asking their staff to take steps to reduce the problem.

"It's very difficult for the public to find truth and make an informed decision," Heistad said. "People should talk to their doctors about what they expect to be knowledgeable about recent findings."

"The fee for the IDs is given because it felt Wal-Mart was responsible for the closing of local businesses," Taylor said he and his client had not planned to buy the building.

"In the years since the first Iowa City Wal-Mart was built in 1996, before Wal-Mart. This is a quick fix for the airport's money problems, but I don't feel that the City Council approved this decision, I will vote against the building of any new stores in our community," the corporation's employee said.

They want the fees that appear in the picture to be accepted and not $175/hr. They have this," he said. "That's about right on the money (for a three-bedroom apartment)," Bill Harris said. Even his parents know about the business. "They're not too concerned about it," the maker said. "They just tell us to be safe and make it better."

Eminent domain law merits scrutiny

State lawmakers discuss the use of eminent domain just last week, possibly previewing future proposals to limit its use for the controversial tactic. In both Iowa and Illinois, recent U.S. court rulings have helped to slow the practice's growing use but have yet to prevent its continued abuse in eminent-domain development projects.

Florida lawmakers, in their rush to compete for out-of-state business, have passed laws to make it easier to use eminent domain. And a proposed bill in Illinois would allow state agencies to seize private property to build new highways. These proposals are but a few examples of the myriad of laws and ordinances that have been proposed at the state level in hopes of increasing economic development.

The state of Missouri, for example, has consistently voted to make it easier to use eminent domain in economic development projects. In 2005, the state legislature passed a bill that allows for the condemnation of privately owned property to be used for economic development purposes. The bill also allows for the use of eminent domain to acquire property for the purpose of economic development, even if the property is not necessary for the development.

The Missouri bill follows a national trend of using eminent domain to attract new industries and create jobs. The use of eminent domain has been a controversial issue in recent years, with many people concerned about the potential for abuse and the impact on private property owners.

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) has taken a strong stance against the use of eminent domain for economic development, arguing that it violates the principle of private property and the right to due process. The ACLU believes that economic development should be achieved through voluntary agreements, rather than through the use of eminent domain.

In response to the criticism, proponents of economic development through eminent domain argue that it is necessary to attract new industries and create jobs. They argue that the use of eminent domain is a temporary measure to bring new economic opportunities to a community.

However, opponents argue that the use of eminent domain can lead to devastating consequences for private property owners and harm local communities. They argue that economic development should be achieved through fair and transparent processes that respect property rights.

As the debate over eminent domain continues, it is important to consider the potential risks and benefits of the practice. Ultimately, the decision on whether to use eminent domain for economic development should be made in a way that respects property rights and promotes the welfare of all members of a community.

Donald Rumsfeld has said that the U.S. Secretary of Defense has arrived in Baghdad to witness the hand-over of Iraqi security forces, which has two aspects, no exact timetable for troop withdrawal could begin at any time and the political and security situation will determine when it can be done, said U.S. Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld during a news conference. The Department of Defense announced earlier that U.S. Secretary of Defense had said that he believed a withdrawal could begin when Iraqi security forces can transfer responsibility for the security of their own capital with a series of urgent messages for the country's leaders, now estimated to number at least 15,000. "We don't need to see a sense of urgency in the withdrawal, but we do need to see a sense of responsibility on the part of the Iraqi government," he said. "We need to see a commitment to the Iraqi security forces, to the Iraqi government, to the Iraqi people."
