In his newly released book, The Iowa State Fair, Ullrich said he decided to showcase the fair through black and white photos of attendees and participants because he believes many photographs of the people at the fair — and Midwesterners — weren’t accurately represented and “look like they’ve just come out of the Dust Bowl.”

“They’re always sort of sad pictures,” Ullrich said. “Someone in bib overalls at a county fair, maybe they’re overweight, maybe they’re looking sad. I can’t really explain it. There’s just something about it. It’s just wrong. These are not the people I grew up with.”

It’s the three-day political sweep Iowans have seen before.
This week, Rand Paul will return to the state’s presidential-trial grounds, visiting eight communities as one of a handful of national GOP leaders who have been viewed as front-runners for the 2016 presidential cycle.

In December 2011, Paul’s father, then-Rep. Ron Paul, R-Texas, traversed through nine cities as part of a three-day circuit through much of central and eastern Iowa. He later went on to lose by a narrow 3 percent margin in the 2012 Iowa caucuses to former Sen. Rick Santorum.

With fewer than 95 days until the 2014 midterm election, the political parades expected to surge in Iowa leading up to 2016 have those deemed interested setting their paths to Pennsylvania Avenue.

However, a pair of political analysts say the younger Paul is certainly testing the presidential waters that remain murky with no decisive front-runner. Experts say it will take a balancing act combining interest and interest in agriculture. And he will return this year.

Accompanied by wife Bobbi Alpers, Ullrich will be at the Iowa State Fair signing books and soaking in the atmosphere of the annual event.

Diving into the journey that is Lollapalooza

Despite the crowds, Lollapalooza still exceeds expectations.

By ANA BARRETT
ananbarrett@uiowa.edu

As another year comes to an end, I have a lot to reflect during my time at Grant Park. I used to live for music festivals — and although I still do, things have definitely changed since I last went to Lollapalooza, two years ago.

My biggest observation: Lollapalooza should be about the music. But it’s turned into more of an event for only the ones who were privileged enough to spend an arm and a leg for a ticket. Whether the festival-goers choose to go all weekend or just one day out of the three-day festival, there is a price to pay. The food, the alcohol, the whole Lollapalooza experience has become commercialized. Not to sound self-righteous, but I go for the music. For the rest of the 500,000 people, it’s an excuse to drink and get high. Don’t get me wrong, I understand that that is part of the music-festival experience. But the older I get, I doubt my ability to tolerate the obnoxious groups of drunk 15-year-olds.

Overall, I have had a good experience at Lollapalooza, but there are definitely some low points that can make any music enthusiast less than pumped to be in Grant Park. For starters, I was enjoying listening to a band such as The Head and the Heart when a group of boys clad in their jerseys and snapbacks started chanting “USA USA USA.” Then there was the time when I was at Grouplove and a girl on the verge of passing out spilled her Bud Light Lime all over me. As if everyone else’s sweat wasn’t enough to have all over me. The beer didn’t kill my vibe, though. Grouplove was too incredible to not enjoy every second.

Before seeing Martin Garrix, I had the pleasure of taking a stranger to the medical tent. Dana, who repeatedly told me I was the most beautiful girl she has ever seen, ended up on a stretcher after she slowly stopped speaking and could no longer stand. I’ve never seen anyone in such bad condition, so I was happy that we got her help before she completely lost it.

As it was, everyone else’s sound wasn’t enough to have all over me. The beer didn’t kill my vibe, though. Grouplove was too incredible to not enjoy every second. Dana, who repeatedly told me I was the most beautiful girl she has ever seen, ended up on a stretcher after she slowly stopped speaking and could no longer stand. I’ve never seen anyone in such bad condition, so I was happy that we got her help before she completely lost it.

Right as she was loaded up onto the cart to be taken to the medical tent, she hurled all over the street, barely missing everyone in the surrounding area. Although I missed almost all of Garrix, I was happy to help a stranger in need. I ended the second night of the festival with Calvin Harris, who was spectacular. There were fireworks in each of his songs, and he did some really great remixes. Despite the rain of the final day at Lollapalooza, it still didn’t stop me from dancing and singing. I was able to see Cage the Elephant again, which I saw two years ago when I went to the festival the first time. Rarely have I danced as much. The third day, no one even cared, and everyone embraced the weather with the music. I think I have contracted hypothermia because of the low temperatures and rainfall accompanied with minimal clothing. It took me over two hours to leave the park and huddle to Union Station. Although Lollapalooza is a lot of fun, it is also full of blood, sweat, and tears — literally. Grant Park really tested my patience and my limbs all weekend.
