County aids refugees with vaccinations

Refugees voiced their needs regarding vaccinations, and the Johnson County Public Health Department is helping to make the vaccines more accessible.

Refugees settling in Johnson County will now have increased access to vaccines.

The Johnson County Public Health Department is working with refugees to eliminate travel and cost barriers that prevented refugees from receiving necessary vaccinations by doing paperwork in addition to administering vaccines.

Jacob Riley, the department's disease-prevention specialist, said awareness of the barriers to vaccinations arose out of a discussion with refugees in December.

disease-prevention specialist

Although the department has offered some vaccinations previously, Riley said, refugees must complete specific forms after being in the U.S. for one year to apply for their green cards with the aid of a civil surgeon.

"Refugees would either have to travel to Polk County or Linn County or go to a private civil surgeon and have a greater cost associated with it, and now that we provide the service in Johnson County, we can do the initial paperwork as well as administer the vaccines," he said. A majority of refugees in Johnson County were not originally resettled here, said Megan Sanchez, a health education coordinator who works with IC Compassion, a non-profit organization that engages culturally diverse communities.

"Essentially, what that means is that they were initially resettled by an agency in another part of the country," she said in an email to The Daily Iowan. "Then, they have chosen to move to Johnson County because of jobs, friends, or family, and/or because

The Great Divide follows Trump

When President Trump held a rally at the U.S. Cellular Center in Cedar Rapids last week, he was greeted by a sea of faithful followers and also by a crowd of critics.

Inside the arena, Trump supporters gazed out the venue's window at a group of protesters stretched alongside the street.

Jim Lendherr, who voted for Trump, said protesters need to understand what is actually going on in the United States.

"I guess it's their right to protest," he said. "But they ought to get themselves educated so they know what's really going on."

Lendherr said he spoke to a protester who wanted Trump to be impeached, to which Lendherr responded, "How come we didn't impeach Obama?"

"He [the protester] said, 'I have no idea,' " Lendherr said. "People don't remember the old days, how hard we worked to make this country, and it seems like it's getting torn down."

For Trump voter Denis Reglin, Trump is doing what he promised. Reglin said he is proudest of Trump's pick for Supreme Court, Neil Gorsuch.

"I don't know that much about it, but [Gorsuch] seems really good," Reglin said. "[He is] a basic fundamental conservative, with same values as [Antonin Scalia], and we needed that."

Jeanette Dennis and Jamie Mapier, who both voted for Trump, said they laughed when they saw protesters outside the venue.

"They're yelling, 'Lock him up, lock him up.' For what?" Mapier said. "What do you want to lock him up for?"

For Dennis, the protesters are just a roadblock to halt Trump's accomplishments.

"He's trying to make changes, and he's getting blocked, and there's no reason," Dennis said. "Give him a chance; he's trying his best."

For Mount Vernon native Roger Schnittjer, however, policies in with Trump's Republican Party caused him to stray from the GOP.

"I can't go with the Republican Party anymore, and I changed some time ago, but the party is no longer what it was," Schnittjer said. "In the middle of the [Ronald Reagan] years is when I stopped."

Schnittjer said he ultimately switched parties because of inequality; he believes there has been an increase in inequality, which is what he said will take the country down.

"[It's] worse with the current administration, and I would like to see the whole world great again," he said. "[Trump] doesn't have a policy. His only policy is to destroy what Obama did because he hates it — it's going to be a tough four years — it'll be better at the end of it."

Kris Hale, a protester from Marion, said she and her daughter protested to show support against what she called "Trump's hatred."

"There's got to be a better way than the way things are running right now," Hale said. "Trump isn't making America great again — I can't stand the thought of the ban, or the wall, or anything related to it."

Richard Pitner, a protester from Cedar Rapids, said he showed up to protest because Trump showed up to speak.

"Trump is here today, which is why we're here today — we can't speak to him in D.C. because he doesn't listen," Pitner said. "A lot of people are disappointed with how he's operating as president — he doesn't know what he means."

Pitner said members of Trump's following are forgetting and ignoring the Constitution.

"We are seeing the operation of termites from within," Pitner said. "Trump is a termite — when his health-care bill is known, I think a lot more people will be upset — he's weakening America every day he's in office — he doesn't deserve to be president."

Bret Nilles, the Linn County Democratic head, said he thinks Trump's campaign promises exemplify the "fantasy world" that he seems to live in.

Nilles said he thinks that in terms of talking about things that he said are never going to happen, and in terms of trying to gain support and have peo-

UI alum sets sights on Argentina

UI graduate Katherine Will is headed to Argentina thanks to a Fulbright English Teaching Assistantship. Only three UI students have received the awards to go to Argentina.

By MARISSA PAYNE

Katherine Will is set to travel from the green fields of Iowa to the mountains and pampas of Argentina for a year.

Will, a recent University of Iowa graduate, received a Fulbright English Teaching Assistantship award to go to the Latin American country. She is one of 16 UI students to receive a Fulbright for 2017-2018, a record high for the school, surpassing the UI's 15 Fulbright recipients in 2016.

In Argentina, Will said, she will work as a language-learning assistant in a teacher-training college while also doing a community-engagement project.

For her community-engagement project, Will plans to set up an art workshop in which students can read and design their own comics. The idea came from a Latin American comics class that she took at the UI, Will said. She also had prior experience teaching a comics class at a summer camp.

"I thought it was really helpful to be able to read the comics and see the images along with the words because then if I didn't know what certain terms were, then with the pictures, I would be able to piece it together," she said.

She said the Fulbright program appealed to her because she did not have the opportunity to study abroad during her undergraduate career, but it would allow her to solidify her Spanish skills and apply classroom content to the context of a real-world situation.

Aside from her studies as a Spanish major, Will said she has gained experience through her work as a Writing Fellow and undergraduate writing tutor in the Writing Center and also by working with international students in summer programs.

These summer programs helped her see how rewarding it could be to work with elementary- and middle-school students, she said, and inspired her to earn her master's in foreign-language education. She said she would like to teach at a dual-immersion school, though she sees herself most likely teaching at the high-school level.

"I feel like in the U.S., there isn't too much of an emphasis on learning a second language or at least there wasn't in Iowa through my K-12 education, so that's also cause they prefer to live in a rural area.” This can lead to problems when it comes time to apply for green cards, Sanchez said, because refugees may not bring their health records with them or did not finish vaccines prior to moving. Sanchez said the change in Johnson County is being discussed with clients “on a case-by-case basis as they apply for green cards,” though email and social media are also being utilized to inform clients. “In addition, we’ve been spreading the word to our clients as they come into the office,” she said. “We’ve found that it’s easiest to spread the word in person with our refugee clients.” Riley said the Johnson County Public Health Department is working to figure out the best way to inform potential clients of the change to the services. Organizations including IC Compassion and the Catherine McCauley Center in Cedar Rapids will be key to referring refugees to the department’s services, he said. “It’s really important that they were on board and an integral part of the process to make sure that all lines of communication are open,” he said. Initially, it seemed that the project would not be possible, but Sanchez said IC Compassion volunteer Dave Shriver, an attorney by trade, “read restrictions and documents on civil surgeons carefully” and ultimately determined that the Johnson County Public Health Department could offer the service to refugees. “I’m so pleased that they’ve been able to move forward with this project,” she said. “The cost of civil surgeon exams was a big barrier for our refugee clients as they were applying for green cards.”

With all the distractions, he said, he can see why Trump supporters believe him. “The way Trump states what’s happening, I could see where if you’re not watching him, there are so many distractions going on — you believe him. In terms of immigration, immigration in the United States has been declining for the last year, crime rate was at its lowest ever last year, and he’s taking credit for it being low now,” Nilles said. “I think there are so many distractions going on that sheer supporters believe him because you really don’t hear the facts of what’s happening.” Justin Wasson, the Linn County Republican head, said he thinks Trump is fulfilling his campaign promises. “The Paris Climate Agreement is a classic example,” Wasson said. “He campaigned on that, he said we’re pulling out, and he did.” Wasson also said he thinks Trump has also followed through in terms of border security and tax reform. “If anything, I find it interesting how people get surprised when he does some of the stuff he does,” he said. “He just told for the last two years that this is what he’s going to do — I think he’s really been fulfilling a lot of the promises he made during the campaign.”

part of the reason I want to become a teacher,” she said. “I think it’s important now more than ever that everyone learns a second language from a young age, particularly Spanish.” Although Will said she is concerned about her language skills and being able to effectively communicate while abroad, Carol Severino, the director of the Writing Center, said Will is a multitasking individual who is skilled at writing, speaking, and listening and could do a lot with her Fulbright scholarship. Will wrote her Honors thesis about tutoring in Spanish and Spanish writing, Severino said, and the thesis will be used to help set up a Spanish writing center in the future. “Her awareness of language and her awareness of writing will [allow her to have] empathy with other learners,” Severino said. Karen Wachsmuth, the UI’s Fulbright program adviser, said the committee that selects Fulbright recipients is not looking for students in cookie-cutter mode, and Will — who, in addition to being fluent in Spanish and skilled in art, plays in an orchestra and string quartet — is evidently a student who follows her passions and is open to discovering new things. “She may be the first person from the United States [the students in Argentina] ever meet,” Wachsmuth said. “She will facilitate cultural exchange, and she’ll make relationships that may last a lifetime. In so doing, she’ll represent the United States well, and she’ll bring back experiences to her professional life in the U.S. that will make her an even more effective teacher.”

MISKY'S MUSIC RECOMMENDATIONS

A review series of new summer albums

Vince Staples is a shark among fish on sophomore album

Long Beach native Vince Staples released his new album, Big Fish Theory, on June 23. The album follows his critically acclaimed Summertime '06 project, released in 2015.

By GAGE MISKIMEN
gage-miskimen@uiowa.edu

There are plenty of fish in the sea that is hip-hop, but none have quite the fins of Vince Staples.

Staples released his sophomore album, Big Fish Theory, last weekend, and the project has the potential to move him into the mainstream.

Big Fish Theory takes a look at rappers and hip-hop in general from “outside the fishbowl”; Staples has always been an observer and critic of all aspects of society. The project analyzes how rappers act and how hip-hop’s looming influence on today’s culture while continuing the theme from his 2016 EP, Prima Donna. That opened with a star rapper (presumably Staples) killing himself, and the rest of the project talked about how the fame and fans pushed him to that point.

Suffering from fame seems to be a constant theme in Staples’ music nowadays. On track three of Big Fish Theory, “Alyssa’s Interlude”, Amy Winehouse’s voice can be heard, taken from a snippet of an interview: “I’m quite a self-destructing person, so I guess I keep giving myself material,” she says. Staples has been vocal about Winehouse’s death and unhappy with how the public has treated her.

Big Fish Theory’s sound is innovative in terms of hip-hop. Electronic house beats are mixed with Staples’ introspective and confident verses in a way that’s never been done successfully before.

The album is sprinkled with guests who add something extra. Artists credited throughout the album include Bon Iver’s Justin Vernon, Kendrick Lamar, Ray-J, ASAP Rocky, Ty Dolla Sign, Kilo Kish, and Juicy J.

Though the album is great as a whole, there are particular tracks that stand out. The Vernon-produced “Crabs in a Bucket” is the opening track, and it kicks off in high gear, only giving the listener a few seconds to get comfortable before the bass hits. “Crabs in a Bucket” refers to the “if I can’t have it, you can’t either” train of thought. Crabs in a bucket will fight and climb over each other to reach the top, but their behavior inevitably does more harm than good to themselves and those around them, and Staples is comparing the crabs to rappers and society in general.

“745” is another highlight of Big Fish Theory. The lyrics have Staples, driving around the city in a BMW 745, venting about his relationships with women. Staples’ typical nihilism shines on this track. “This thing called love real hard for me/This thing called love is a God to me/and we all just God’s property/So feel free to fulfill the prophecy.”

He has always felt like an outsider to hip-hop until recently. He has a Sprite endorsement deal, and radio shows in bigger cities such as “The Breakfast Club” on 105.1 are eager to interview him because of his dry humor and straightforward opinions. In Pitchfork’s “Over/Under” series on YouTube, Staples rated random things the hosts said from KFC to Tom Cruise, who he thought was underrated “because the mission was impossible, and he pulled it off three times.”

All this exposure, on top of his talent as a rapper, has brought him to the forefront of hip-hop. Staples’ lyricism, flow, and consistency in putting out high-caliber projects from mixtapes to full-length albums land him in the running for “greatest rapper alive” among Kendrick Lamar and ... that’s about it. But honestly, listen to Staples, and see what he’s accomplishing in his music, and one might consider him the heir to the throne.

By DAN WILLIAMS
dan.willia@yahoo.com

After critiquing American imperialism for decades, columnist and social critic Christopher Hitchens's continued support for the Iraq war remains somewhat of a mystery of an otherwise brilliant career.

In his 2016 book, Exit Right, Daniel Oppenheimer looks at Hitchens' alleged move from the left to the right, along with five other political figures, trying to understand each one's motives. It is a valuable book for understanding the current political landscape.

Though the entire book is worth reading, the chapter on Hitchens initially caught my eye. Hitchens was enormously popular when I was growing up. God is not Great came out when I was a sophomore in high school, and his iconoclastic take on religion was irresistible.

Politically, his eloquence was truly inimitable. In his early years, his logic, too, was impeccable. He had a talent for the theater of political debate and was capable of mustering rhetoric to devastating effect. What budding teenage intellectual didn't want to develop her or his own "Hitch slap"?

(One notices a rather venomous version of this in Milo Yiannopoulos.)

The most politically controversial position Hitchens took, however, was on the Iraq War. His vehement support and justification for the war signaled to many a decisive break from the anti-imperialist left of his early years. But Oppenheimer errs on the reductive side when he writes, "Having preserved his moral cleanliness for decades precisely by puncturing grand narratives rather than embracing them, Hitchens was finally ready for his great cause."

If one reads Hitchens' essays written immediately after 9/11, collected in Love, Poverty, and War, one can still feel the rawness of the event, the immediate aftermath, and Hitchens' repugnance for any feelings of collective guilt and moral equivalency of the sort that Noam Chomsky was airing — a kind of "we deserved it for what we've done." Hitchens saw this, rightly, as depraved masochism.

Hitchens always had a strong strain of English Republicanism in him, one of the reasons he so admired the American Revolution, which, in its philosophical underpinnings, was an English revolution. And a central tenet of English Republicanism was a respect for individual liberty against a tyrannical state.

Throughout the 1990s, Hitchens became increasingly disgusted with the neoliberal consensus between Republicans and Democrats, which he saw as a dangerous move toward a one-party state. And for this reason, I do not think that we can really follow Oppenheimer in saying that Hitchens "exited right." Oppenheimer contends that Hitchens' support for the Iraq War constituted not only an apostasy from the left but an accompanying joining of the right. What this is better interpreted as is an unprecedented instance of Hitchens "going along" with the consensus.

It will be remembered that the only politicians who opposed the Iraq War were those on the far right and the far left.

What was surprising was that Hitchens never backed down from his initial position, that the United States had done the right thing in toppling Saddam Hussein's ruthless dictatorship — even when it became clear that the public had been lied to, that there was good evidence to believe that the war itself, however liberating for the Iraqi people it could have been, was in fact a botched enterprise.

Oppenheimer is right to title his chapter on Hitchens "A Man Alone," for his apostasy from the left was less a move from left to right as a declaration of independence from the left. History may judge Hitchens harshly on the Iraq War, but it should not judge him as "switching teams." In the pursuit of truth and justice, he was, and remains, a man alone.

Sartre and hah-hah care

By BEAU ELLIOT
beauelliott@gmail.com

This is the week that was; Congress will decide to be cutting-edge and exciting and make all video games free on demand. Hah, Congress will say. Hack that, Putin.

OK, well, no. That was fake news to its core, not that it had a core. What? You thought it was an apple?

And besides, when has Congress ever been cutting-edge and exciting?

No, the Senate this week will attempt to vote on the GOP health-care proposal. Yeah, we know. We all will be on the edges of our seats, because the debate promises to be inflammable. Or at least as inflamed as the Senate ever gets.

Crickets. No crickets ever get scorched in an "inflamed" Senate debate. They die of yawning too quickly.

And yes, Virginia, the word is "inflammable." The prefix "in" in the word does not mean, well, "not."

It means, in highly technical grammatical terms reaching back many centuries to the Latin roots of the prefix: Yo, buster, no open flames around this "stuff," because it will blow up in your face. Which, in your case, might be an improvement.

(Those Latin guys had such a way with words. That's probably why today Latin is a "dead language.")

Which brings us, as life so often does, back to health care. And baseball. Many Americans, it seems, according to no scientific research whatsoever (that's the American way), view health-care bills and baseball as dead languages. In other words, boring. (There those crickets are again, still not scorched.)

Our extensive research appears to show that the only people who believe baseball is boring are themselves boring. Who could be bored, for instance, when a batter faces the ballet count? You know, 2-2.

Baseball is, at its heart, existentialism. There are many outs, but, as Sartre pointed out in his famous essay on baseball, no exit.

Health-care bills, on the other hand (depending on which hand you started with) tend to put people to death by yawning. In which case, they no longer have to be concerned about health-care bills, which might be the point.

The current GOP health-care bill appears to face some uphill rowing, though why people, even senators, would try to row a boat on a hill remains unclear. Depending on who's talking, the bill is DOA. Or it's going to pass on a 50-50 vote, with VP Mike Pence riding to the Republicans' rescue in a great-white-hope move and casting the killer tie-breaker. And we do mean white. Not to mention killer.

Or the GOP health bill could disappear down the proverbial rabbit hole to reside with Alice in Wonderland. (Note: Alice doesn't live there anymore.)

OK, it's a tad more complicated than that. So what isn't?

The GOP health-care bill is highly unpopular, according to many polls. This, apparently, comes as a major surprise to the 13 or so older, white, wealthy senators who crafted the bill in secret for many weeks. The bill could cause 22 million or so working-class and poor people to lose health insurance while giving older, white, wealthy people some juicy tax cuts. People who don't have any worries about health insurance, except that poor people might get it, too.

What could possibly be unpopular about that?

Actually, we'd rather talk about cut fastballs, though it does seem as if Republicans are throwing nothing but cut fastballs.

Meanwhile, speaking of existentialism, Amazon will buy Whole Foods, thus spawning such headlines as "Organic robots seize foodie icon."

Hmm. As Sartre says, no exit.

GUEST OPINION

'We have met the enemy, and he is us' as poso says

Great Depression. Pearl Harbor. 9/11. Sandy Hook. June 14's Alexandria, Virginia, shooting of Republican congressmen. The list of tragic events Americans have witnessed is endless.

It's during troubling times our politicians and citizens came together, set aside their party affiliation, and resolve conflict. But; usually, the solidarity moments are soon forgotten, and polarization picks up where it left off.

While political scientists may disagree on whether political polarization started after the Civil War's Reconstruction era, mid-1970s, or early 1990s, all agree divisiveness is now at its zenith. With few exceptions, party-line roll-call voting has become standard protocol.

Around 93 percent of the voting choices during America's 114th congressional session (2015-16) were along party lines — Democrats voted one way, and Republicans voted the opposite. Never the twain shall meet seems to be apropos in today's political world. The result of polarization is that nothing worthwhile gets accomplished, and status quo becomes institutionalized.

The bulk of roll-call voting in Congress comes down to two issues: the role of government intrusion in the economy and regional differences, whether it's rural versus urban, upper versus lower class or white-collar versus blue-collar.

The largest political survey of 10,000 adults conducted by the Pew Research Center during January-March revealed Democrats and Republicans are further apart ideologically than at ANY point in history.

What has brought us to such divisiveness?

Four pieces of evidence hit me square in the face. First, the typical Republican is more conservative than 94 percent of Democrats, and the median Democrat is more liberal than 92 percent of Republicans, a 20 percent increase from 20 years ago.

Second, partisan antipathy has risen. Forty-three percent of Republicans, versus 17 percent 20 years ago, have very unfavorable opinions of the Democratic Party. Likewise, the share of Democrats with very negative opinions of the Republican Party has more than doubled in the past 20 years from 15 percent to 38 percent.

Third, the percentage of independents who embrace both liberal and conservative views has shrunk from 49 percent two decades ago to now 39 percent.

Finally, the most telling about why we are in the era of polarization is 62 percent of Dems and 57 percent of Republicans define compromise as "their side gets more of what it wants."

Only 80 U.S. congressional delegates, about half Republican and half Democrat, have formally endorsed the nonprofit organization No Labels, which wants to replace the politics of partisan point-scoring with the politics of productive problem-solving. They have co-sponsored nearly 20 different pieces of bipartisan legislation.

Stop and think about this. Only 15 percent (80 of 535) of our congressional representatives have formally agreed to the bipartisanship value. No wonder Washington is a mess.

Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst, R-Iowa, and Iowa Reps. Rod Blum (Republican), David Loebbeck (Democrat), and David Young (Republican) are No Labels bipartisan supporters. Not surprisingly, Rep. Steve King, R-Iowa, wants nothing to do with bipartisanship behavior.

What should we do about this polarization albatross? First, let's conduct an honest soul-searching assessment of our attitude toward both party's platform positions and polarization record, seek out multiple and diverse sources of information to become better informed, be open to non-combative dialogue with others who view life differently, and become politically active.

Second, we need to do a better job of vetting our Democrat and Republican candidates to determine if their values are too far left- or right-wing damaging or are they more moderate to bring our country back together in a more peaceful, centrist, constructive, and productive manner.

America's 325 million citizens deserve bipartisanship behavior, and only we, yes, that includes you and me, can put an end to stifling polarization. I'm up to the challenge of political soul searching and retrofitting my beliefs. How about you?

Mens golf lands two international recruits

Iowa golf says goodbye to two greats, Raymond Knoll and Carson Schaake, by welcoming in newcomers Jake Rowe and Jaewook Lee this fall.

By JORDAN ZUNIGA
jordan-zuniga@uiowa.edu

In May, Iowa men's golf said goodbye to two great Hawkeye golfers in Raymond Knoll and Carson Schaake.

Both had tremendous college careers as Hawkeyes, each earning All-Big Ten recognition numerous times, and Schaake won the Big Ten Tournament as an individual his sophomore year.

It's safe to say both left behind big golf bags to fill.

The Hawkeyes hope recently signed UK native Jake Rowe can fill one of those bags.

As last year's Tanager Golf Club's junior captain, Rowe placed second in the Ulster U18 Championship.

Rowe's club was also able to qualify to represent Northern Ireland in the European U18 Golf Championships in Spain.

Individually, Rowe dominated the Ulster Winter Series, winning the title by 4 strokes.

As good as Rowe is with a golf club in hand, he's just as good, if not better, with a hockey stick in his hand. As the captain of Ulster's field-hockey team, he also represented Northern Ireland at an international level.

Last year, Rowe turned down a position on the U18 field-hockey team to focus on golf.

"We are very excited to welcome Jake into the Iowa golf program," head coach Tyler Stith said in a release. "We were impressed with his athleticism, technical ability, and strong leadership qualities. He will continue to improve with more experience and has the potential to be an outstanding Big Ten student-athlete."

Rowe is the second member of Iowa's 2017 recruiting class, joining Langley, British Columbia, Canada, native Jaewook Lee.

Lee, who recently graduated from Walnut Grove Secondary School, qualified for state four times and each time recorded a top-10 finish. He was also a major contributor for his team when it won its conference championship in 2016.

"I felt I needed to go to the University of Iowa when I talked with Coach Stith," Lee said in a release, "I love the campus, facilities, and especially the atmosphere around the school. I look forward to starting my career as an Iowa Hawkeye."

After visiting Iowa, Rowe had at least one thing in common with Lee, and that was that Iowa felt like the place he wanted to be.

The two freshmen hope to maintain the Hawkeye's run of nine-consecutive NCAA regional appearances.

Norwalk, Iowa, is the second four-star recruit in the 2019 class.

Endres is the second addition to Iowa's O-line in the 2019 class after future teammate Ezra Miller announced his commitment to the Hawkeyes.

Iowa is known for recruiting for its offensive line.

This past season, Iowa won the Joe Moore Award for Most Outstanding Offensive Line. Iowa isn't done just yet.

Decisions should come soon from defensive tackle Julius Brents, tight end Jack Plumb, and cornerback Larry Tracy.

Brents, a class of 2018 prospect, told an online source that "Iowa was great; never a dull moment in Iowa City."

The Indianapolis native looks as if he wants to keep his options open, but he will come back for a few more visits before making his decision.

As for Plumb, he announced that he would decide in July on his football future.

Right now, he is getting a lot of attention from Wisconsin, but Iowa might still have a shot at bringing him to Iowa City.

"The visit went really well," Plumb told an online source. "A decision will come in July. I liked it a lot. I really enjoyed talking to the current players and the guys that have committed about why they chose Iowa and what they like about it."

Tracy, a member of the 2019 class, is gaining early attention from Iowa; the cornerback is at the top of Hawkeyes' list.

After coming back to campus for a more in-depth visit, the India- napolis Star hinted at a possible commitment.

After taking in all of the festivities on his visit, Tracy went to Twitter to thank and share his fun with the football program.

"Amazing visit to Iowa this weekend with some great people thanks to @HawkeyeFootball entire staff will definitely be back again #swarm19??"

He matched the tweet with photos of him showing off the No.2 Hawkeye jersey. Iowa might have played that one the right way.

The Hawkeyes have gained some valuable ammunition to its future rosters and has also made a statement gaining commitments from the top-two players in the state.

Third baseman Mike Moustakas has also played a huge role with his power at the plate. A threat to go deep every time he comes to bat, he has crushed 19 homers this season and is well on his way to shattering Steve Balboni's franchise record of 36.

Another key is the emergence of second baseman Whit Merrifield.

After getting a good chunk of playing time last season, the South Carolina product began the season in Triple-A Omaha when the Royals opted to start the young Raúl Mondesí.

The experiment didn't work for the time being, and Mondesí was sent down, and Merrifield was called up.

Since then, Merrifield has made his presence felt, hitting .283 with 29 RBIs. He also concluded the Royals' June 23 win over the Blue Jays with a walk-off 2-run double.

The team scored 4 runs with two outs in the bottom of the ninth to seal the comeback victory.

In addition to its offensive improvement, Kansas City has had stellar pitching throughout the season.

Even though Opening Day starter Danny Duffy hasn't left the disabled list since May 30, and fellow starter Nathan Karns hasn't played since the end of the same month, the rest of the pitching staff has picked up the slack.

Starting pitcher Jason Vargas has been tremendous. He is tied for the most wins in the league with 11, earning a victory in each of his last six starts.

The Apple Valley, California, native also owns the second-best ERA in all of baseball at 2.29.

The Royals received some good news in regards to Duffy; he began his rehab assignment in Omaha following an oblique injury.

When the season started, people were already counting the Royals out. But just as they have time and time again, they have come back and made themselves a threat.

Duffy has had plenty of time to deal with his injury, and he offered his thoughts on the team's recent surge and outside expectations.

"Every year, y'all count us out. & late June, every year, we flip that switch. And the networks jump on board ..." Duffy tweeted on June 24. "we never left, you guys."

"... none of us have vacation in October. Don't sleep on the boys."

The 2017 Big Ten-ACC Challenge announced

The 19th-annual Big Ten-ACC Challenge will be played Nov. 27-30 of this year between the divisions basketball teams.

On Monday, both conferences announced the matchups that will feature all 14 Big Ten teams and all but one ACC team.

Many Hawkeyes and Hawkeye fans might have wondered whom they will face; the answer is Virginia Tech.

Iowa is set to play the Hokies on Nov. 28 in Blacksburg, Virginia.

This will be the fourth time that Iowa will meet Virginia Tech on the court during the Challenge, but the first since 2012.

The Hokies hold the winning record against the Hawkeyes, winning three out of the four contests.

In 2006 Iowa fell 69-65, in 2009 the final score was 70-64, and in 2012 the Hokies blew out the Hawkeyes with a score of 95-79.

Last year the ACC won the challenge with a final count of 9-5 to keep the Commissioners Cup.

This year the Big Ten looks to regain the cup since winning the challenge in 2015.

NBA

The NBA season is over, so now all attention has been shifted to celebrations and awards for the best in the league.

The NBA hosted its first-ever award show Monday night to recognize the best in NBA basketball.

Here are The Daily Iowan's top three awards that were given out on Monday night:

Most Valuable Player: Russell Westbrook, Oklahoma City Thunder

Westbrook had a standout season with the Thunder, and now he has the MVP award to top it off. He averaged 31.6 points a game along with 10.6 rebounds and 10.4 assists.

Westbrook is the first player to average a triple double in a season since Oscar Robertson.

Defensive Player of the Year: Draymond Green, Golden State Warriors

After leading the Warriors to an NBA title, Green's abilities are pretty clear.

After being the runner-up two years in a row for the award, the third time actually was the charm for Green.

Rookie of the Year: Malcolm Brogdon, Milwaukee Bucks

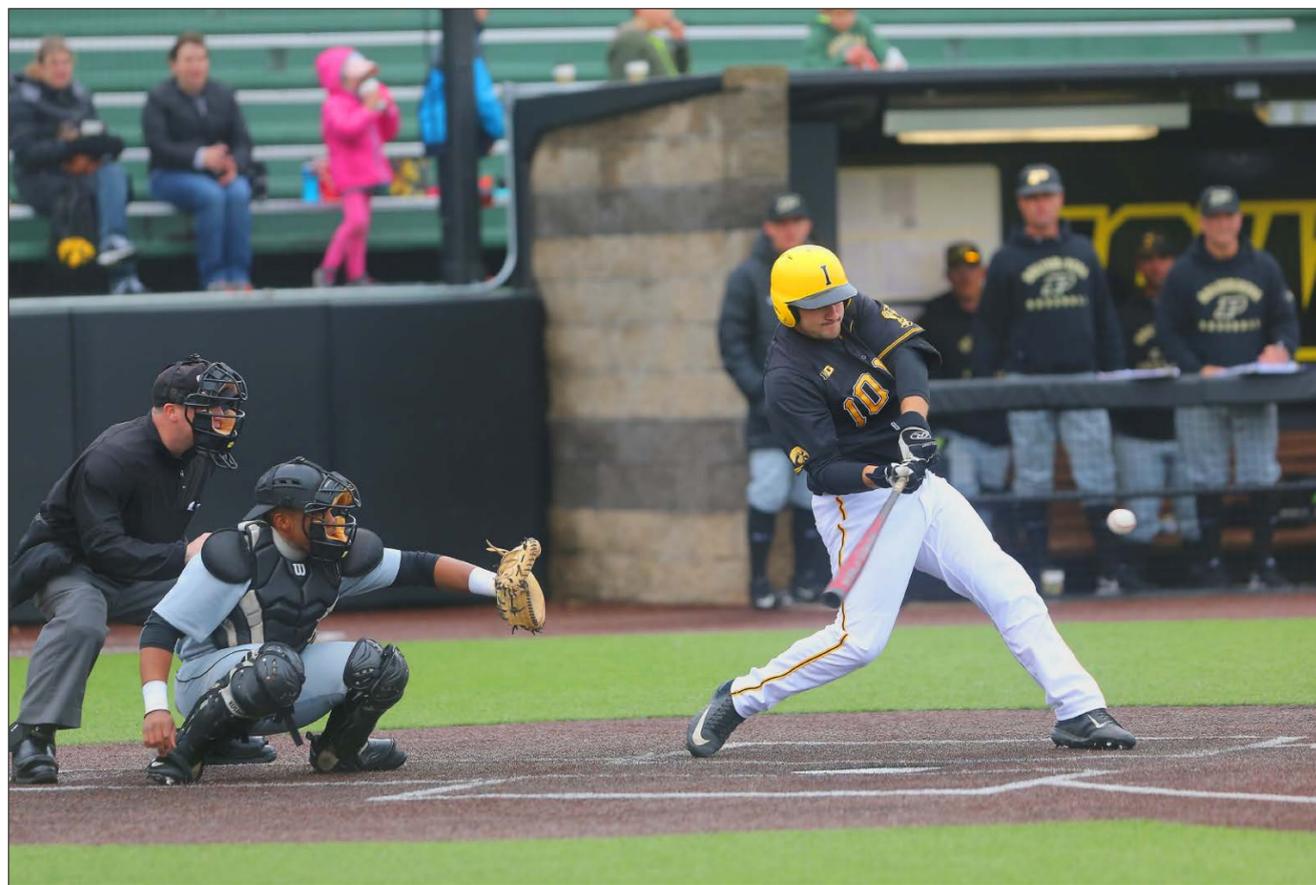

After being the lowest drafted rookie, 36th, Brogdon showed it doesn't matter where or when you are drafted but what you do afterwards.

Brogdon averaged 10 points and 4 assists per game this past season.

The Bucks and Brogdon ended the season with a 42-40 record landing in sixth place in the East.

Adams has smashing start

Jake Adams makes his minor-league debut after crushing the school homerun record and leading the NCAA with 29 homeruns. Even though he has played in many baseball games, he surely won't forget this one.

By JESS WESTENDORF | jessica-westendorf@uiowa.edu

After a tremendous season on the Iowa baseball team, earning numerous in-season and postseason honors and becoming one of the highest Iowa players to go in the MLB Draft, former first baseman Jake Adams isn't stopping there.

The Houston Astros drafted Adams in the sixth round as the 181st pick on June 13.

The junior had just completed a successful season with the Hawkeyes, even though it might not have ended the way he and his team had wanted.

But after being eliminated by Texas A&M at the NCAA Regional in Houston, Adams probably wouldn't have guessed that he would return to represent the Astros organization in the minor leagues and one day, hopefully, the majors.

Like most other newly drafted players,

Adams was sent to the short-season minor leagues, Houston's Tri-City ValleyCats of the New York-Penn League.

But that is just one more stage in which he can showcase his power, strength, and hitting abilities to fans and coaches.

On June 23, Adams walked up to the plate at Bruno Stadium in Troy, New York, for the first time, hoping he would make a grand entrance.

In his new home for the time being, Adams sent a towering 425-foot home run in to deep centerfield.

You could call that a grand entrance.

The ValleyCats were not able to pull out the victory, falling, 7-2, to the Lowell Spinners, but Adams received plenty of attention.

In an interview with the media, Adams said, "We were out at practice, and Coach Morgan said, 'There is nothing better than your pro-day debut to be a leadoff bomb.'"

It seems like once he got to the plate, he knew what he wanted.

"I was getting up there, and I knew I was looking for a fastball," Adams said to the media. "I knew I was going to get one, and I left one over the plate, getting a good swing off on it, and it was one of the best feelings I have ever had."

The home run is just one of many, but I have a feeling this one tops them all.

During his lone season at Iowa, Adams broke the school record for home runs and also led the NCAA with 29.

He nabbed seven All-America honors in the last part of the season while leading the Hawkeyes to its first ever Big Ten Tournament Championship and its second trip to the NCAA regionals in the last three seasons.

"It's one of the most memorable home runs that I will cherish for the rest of my life," Adams told the media. "I have hit many of home runs, but that one just kind of tops them all."

Royals steam into AL Central race

The Kansas City Royals are hot on the trail in the American League Central after a slow and rocky start to the season.

By PETE RUDEN
peter-ruden@uiowa.edu

It's no secret; the Royals have been one of the hottest teams in all of baseball recently, and they show no signs of slowing down.

After a slow start to the season that included a nine-game losing streak, Kansas City has picked up the pace to win its last five series and put itself right in the heart of the AL Central race.

When the team was in the early months of the season, it suffered a seemingly inescapable lull at the plate. While the starting rotation boasted one of the best ERAs in the league, the offense just could not generate runs.

However, just as fans hoped, the Royals got into a groove.

First baseman Eric Hosmer and catcher Salvador Perez have been superb, batting .302 and .290 respectively while also leading their positions in All Star voting for the American League.

Football snares two oral pledges

The Iowa Football program had a big weekend after two class of 2019 players verbally commit to the Hawkeyes.

By JESS WESTENDORF

The Iowa football program isn't wasting any time, and it looks as if it is just getting started. Over the weekend, the Hawkeyes received oral commitments from two rising juniors in high-school football.
