Nation's Population Is Aging, Decline in Birth Rate Marked

by LOGAN CAMERON

The people of the United States are becoming older. When the Census of 1930 was taken, the percentage of the population over 65 was much less than it is today, and the 1940 census will show an even greater increase. This is because the birth rate is declining and the death rate is remaining relatively constant.

The birth rate has been declining steadily for several decades. In 1850, the birth rate was over 40 per 1,000 population; in 1900, it was 33 per 1,000; and in 1930, it was 25 per 1,000. The death rate has remained relatively constant at about 12 per 1,000 population for several decades.

The aging of the population has important economic implications. A larger proportion of the population is over 65, meaning that there are more older people in the workforce and fewer young people entering the workforce.

The implications of an aging population include increased demands on retirement income systems, increased health care costs, and increased demands on social services.

In conclusion, the aging of the population is a significant trend that will have important implications for society. It is important to understand the causes of the aging population and to prepare for the challenges it presents.
