A Note on Fraternities--

What Will Iowa's Affiliated Men, and Their Prospective Pledge, Have in Mind as This Rush Week Begins?

Today marks the opening of rush week for the members of the fraternity world of University of Iowa. The campus, in the few days prior to the rush festivities, has been transformed into a veritable little city, replete with activities necessary for the socializing of the men. Thus the fraternities have an opportunity to show their worth to the collegiate world, and the men are given an opportunity to select the fraternity most suitable to their ideas. The presidents of the fraternities have for the past few days been busy with the planning of the rush week, in order that they may supply an opportunity for the men to be exposed to the various fraternity ideas.

For the most part, the men will join in these activities to see which fraternity appeals to them the most. The fraternity activities are designed to show the men what the fraternity is all about, and to give them an opportunity to meet the members of the fraternity, and thus to get a better idea of the fraternity's spirit. The fraternities have been working hard to make the rush week a success, and they are confident that it will be a great success.

The fraternities are divided into two main groups: the social fraternities and the professional fraternities. The social fraternities are designed for the socializing of the men, and the professional fraternities are designed for the professional development of the men. Each fraternity has its own unique characteristics, and the men are encouraged to join the fraternity that best suits their interests.

The fraternities are also divided into two categories: the national fraternities and the local fraternities. The national fraternities are those that are affiliated with national organizations, and the local fraternities are those that are not affiliated with national organizations. The national fraternities are usually larger in size, and they have a broader scope of activities. The local fraternities are usually smaller in size, and they have a narrower scope of activities.

In conclusion, the fraternities are an important part of the collegiate world, and the men are given an opportunity to select the fraternity that best suits their interests. The fraternities are divided into two main groups: the social fraternities and the professional fraternities, and they are divided into two categories: the national fraternities and the local fraternities.
