Covering The Capital

By Jack Stinnett

WASHINGTON (AP) - The capital has been able to reach $1,000,000 a year for modernizing the National Guard, but members hold on to the old equipment. The situation is not as bad as it seems, however.

The National Guard has been in a state of transition. It was decided that the guard should be reorganized and that new equipment should be procured. The old equipment was in bad shape and was unsuitable for modern warfare.

As the transition proceeded, military leaders realized that the old equipment was not only unsuitable, but also lacked the necessary features to meet modern requirements.

The new equipment was procured through the National Guard Bureau, which is responsible for the modernization of the National Guard.
