Don't Try to Pin it on Labor

The word is being spread abroad that the American worker is lying down on the job. Industry and its spokesmen in the press for contraints workers are projecting a situation that labor is responsible for inflation.

The thought that the present high prices have been caused by wage increases which were not accompanied by corresponding increases in the cost of production is one of the arguments which are being designed to show that the present price rise is the direct result of labor's action. Later, the argument is put forward that wage increases perhaps account for a small or minor part of the price rise.

American business is quick to point out every opportunity for the possibility of saving money. When they mention the absence of labor, they are talking in general terms. It is not true to say that there is no labor in the United States, but the . . .
