Psychologist Calls Personality, Background Most Important Facts in Marital Success

"Psychologically and background factors are more important in determining the success of marriage," Dr. Ralph E. Dean, professor of psychology and director of campus counseling services, said yesterday.

Dean asserted that in a study made with aid of Dr. William W. Johnston and Dr. Bruce A. Bryan, assistant professor of psychology, that the background factors rank equally with personality factors in determining marital success.

"There are many other factors," Dr. Dean said, "influencing marital success. Prof. Johnston and I have specific information on the subject."

The study, which was done among 100 couples, was based on the evidence that those couples have a high rate of successful marriages. "The study did not include personality factors," Dr. Dean said.

The study included a number of variables which were measured, including the following:

1. The degree of similarity of background and personality factors.
2. The degree of similarity of the couple's life styles.
3. The degree of similarity of the couple's education.
4. The degree of similarity of the couple's occupation.
5. The degree of similarity of the couple's religious beliefs.
6. The degree of similarity of the couple's political beliefs.
7. The degree of similarity of the couple's social activities.
8. The degree of similarity of the couple's financial status.
9. The degree of similarity of the couple's health.
10. The degree of similarity of the couple's physical attractiveness.

"Individuals," Dr. Dean said, "will be asked to rate their degree of similarity on each of the above factors."
