Employers Have Right To Minkle Decent Profit

Any efforts to improve labor relations and to raise the standard of living for workers seem doomed unless both the employers and workers accept the fact that the employer has a right to make a decent profit.

Our economy is dependent upon a steady flow of goods from the mills and factories. It is impossible to maintain this flow unless there is a profit to be made from the operation of these mills and factories.

Therefore, the employer has the right to make a profit and the worker has the right to receive a living wage.

When the employer makes a profit, he is able to provide the necessary funds for the operation of the business. Without this profit, the business would collapse and the worker would be unemployed.

The worker, on the other hand, has the right to receive a living wage in order to support himself and his family.

It is the responsibility of each individual to work towards the betterment of both himself and his employer. This can be achieved through increased productivity, improved efficiency, and a commitment to quality work.

In conclusion, both the employer and worker have rights that must be respected in order to maintain a healthy and prosperous economy.
