The current American desire for educational reform is in part a reaction to the lack of usefulness of our educational system today. One of the latest is the duplication taking place between high school and college courses. This, according to a recent issue of the National Education Association Journal, is one of the great water holes in our educational system today. To an article entitled, "Double Exposure in Education," a Colorado College professor points out that there is a startling similarity between high school and college courses. He states, "Many introductory courses required of college freshmen bear a remarkable likeness to courses already taken in high school!"

High schools and colleges frequently require students to take survey courses in, for example, world history that are similar in content and subject coverage. Despite this, college history courses often overlook that students had not been introduced to the subject below.

American history courses present a similar situation, the professor contends. Many students take history courses in junior high school and again in high school. Then they are "introduced" to the subject in a college course taken during the freshman or sophomore year of college.

The professor concludes: "The true students finish the college course, they have fought the American Revolution in many ways that they have never even won the battle for useful schools."

Study Of Foreign Language Increases In Iowa Schools

Brumley, secondary schools, for the first time in a private school. Mr. and Mrs. Albert J. Robbins said.

The fact that so many educators of foreign language have grown with each succeeding generation will be seen as the threshold of a revolution in the study of foreign language learning.

The number of students taking foreign language classes is increasing, and this is a sign that the movement toward the study of foreign languages is being well accepted.

In a private school in Des Moines, the principal said it is so enjoyable and worthwhile, and then decided to offer the program. He said the children apply their knowledge in a practical way and are able to comprehend what they are learning.
